LAFAYETTE IN AMERICA.

CHATHAM, N. B, Oct. 26, '81

Our cousins across the line have resolved not to forget the memory of the selfish young again, only four years before his been for the best, and both na-French nobleman who, in 1778, came to the rescue of the re.. volted colonies, and contributed not merely the prestige of his name, or even his personal courage, but alas his unimpeachable purity and integrity of character to their cause. The Americans do well not to ignore the chivalrous young man-for he was only just of age-who, so soon as his Government had signed the treaty with Franklin and his fellow-envoys, crossed ing connections are to witness the Atlantic at his own cost, and risked his fortunes in the cause of revolution, Lafayette was precisely the man to stand by the side of Washington, for in their moral natures they were closely akin. The Frenchman's inferiority was displayed in after years, when his mettle was sorely tried in the fire on a grander scale; but in America his valour was well approved, his motives were beyond reproach, and his loyalty to the cause he embraced with so much enthusiasm never faltered. The moral effects of his adhesion to the American banner was even of more importance than the material or intellectual assistance he brought to bear on its side. No leader of men himself, as subsequent events proved, Lafayette, as subordinate to the American chief, was in his right place. Both of them were generals of strong moral fibre, and in grace of manner and cordiality of temper the Frenchman surpassed the American. But he did not possess Washington's prescience, his unwearying patience, his strategical skill. Yet he had marched fifteen hundred tell him dull and sterotyed to call on this young nobleman. without miles, Savannah and Charles stories, nobody to ask him to experience of any sort, was tower of strength to the revolutinary cause. During that weak period of discord, when the demons from Clinton, however, signs of the great chief were in danger of being thwarted by jealousy and impatience, Lafay, ginian sea-board, and he shortly ette never for a moment wavered in his ardent attachment to Washington.
