MR. BLAKE'S SPEECH.

We shall endeavour now as we promised in our last, to lay Burchill had finished reading the address Mr. Blake began.-He said he was thankful for the personal allusions made to him in the address, and expressed the pleasure he felt at addressing such a fine audience as those assembled around him. He said his voice was not very to make himself be heard. He portant matter, one that concerned every one who listened cerned him, looking for a premiership?] He said it was his business there to keep his mouth open for an hour or so, and it was the business of the audience to keep theirs shut. [This is the eighth time Mr. Blake has repeated this joke in the Maritime Provinces. The joke comes down from the time of Swift.] He then stated what he conceived to be the people's duty in informing themselves in telligently on the public questing ons of the day, thinking for themselves and going to the bottom of the questions before them, and when they go the polls, voting on their intelligent convictions. He likewise discoursed with happy ease, and logical accuracy on the principles of responsible government, and what constituted it from the elector up to the elect, and after subscribing to the hoary doctrines of the old Free Trade schools said we were now engaged in this country in a struggle for freedom, not of re.

ligious or personal freedom, but of FREEDOM OF PROPERTY.
