

BRAVE AUNT KATY.

BY MRS. NELLIE EYSTER.

There is a true story which I never weary of telling whenever the opportunity offers by which its recital can point a moral. Thus it runs:

It was Ned Thornton's eighteenth birthday. A year previous, when he had received the merry congratulations of his friends upon a similar event, he was as rollicking, fun-loving, clean-hearted and popular a boy as ever handled a bat or tossed a snow ball. Within the twelve months that lay folded between that memorial day and this one, he had fallen from his high estate and become that saddest of earthly sights to pure eyes, a fast young man.

As he lounged carelessly over the counter of a drinking saloon, waiting for the glass of beer just ordered, and wondering why the fellows whom he was to have met there by appointment were so slow, he seemed as impervious to any tender emotion as though his handsome face and form had been carved out of granite.

As he stood tapping on the smooth marble, and thinking of the wild debauch which had been planned for the coming evening, out of compliment to him, a glass door in the rear opened; he heard a sigh, and turning, confronted an old, wrinkled black woman.

With a scrubbing brush in one hand, and a small pot of sand in the other, she stood an instant, steadily scanning him from head to foot.

Hallo, aunty! have you an idea of scouring me? he asked.

De outside is peart and smart lookin' enuff, sir; it's inside whar de great stain is I can't tech, she replied, never removing her earnest gaze.

The blood mounted to Ned's forehead until his eyes flashed at what he considered her insolence.

What do you mean, you old fool. I'll teach you the proper way to address me; I'll—

Stop, stop, honey! she exclaimed, laying the back of the brush, with her hand still clasping it, upon his coat sleeve. I've already drest you in re times dan you kin count. 'Twon't help none to' buse and scarify old Katy. I've long wanted a chance at you, and now I'll keep my mind. You is mos' a man now, you is; but, honey, it pears to me no time since your two-year-old birfday, when dese arms kerried you on a pillar night an' day for mos' a week. Your mother was worn out nussin' you, for you was drefful sick. One day when you laid on my lap jis' as white an' limp ey as a wet clof, she leaned over you a prayin' an' a cryin, an' said: 'Jis' let my precious boy lib, dear Lord, an' I gib him to your service for ebber an' ebber.'

He the good Marster, took her home to him soon arter dat, and I nussed you a year longer, 'cordin' to my promise to her. De Lord heard dat prayer, an, you is mos' a man. Whose strenf you wastin' now yours or de Lord's? Who you 'long to, yourself or he? Why is you brinin' disgrace on the name of your angel mother? Who is you scandalizin' an' reproachin' all the time? De dear Lord' your bes' frien, Oh, Neddy! ole mistus little boy, Neddy.

At that instant the bar-tender, who had been providentially detained, approached with the foaming bitters and at the same moment, in rushed, laughing and shouting, three of the wildest lads in town. Old Katy vanished as they came near.

Been treating old Fifeenth, Ned? said Max Murray the ring-leader of the Fearless Four, as Ned had dubbed his party of intimates. You look as sober as though you had swallowed her. Four slings, Pete, nodding to the waiter, and make them as stiff as a bristle. What the mischief is wrong, Ned? I can't understand you, he continued, as Ned, with hands thrust into the depths of his pockets and grave face from which all color had fled, stood just where Aunt Katy had left him.

None but the tender, pitying Christ knew the nature of the struggle which had commenced so suddenly, yet violently, in Ned's heart, nor the flood of beautiful memories which were pouring in upon his awakened soul. Words can no more convey an idea of their power and swiftness than they can show to a blind man the soft blue of a summer's sky.

Lord help me! he breathed, and already the giant grip seemed loosening.

None for me, Max, as his astonished friend held the tempting glass to his lips.

Are you sick, Ned? You are as grey as ashes, said Hugh Brown. Yes, boys, I am sick of myself, and covering his face with his cap, he wept—like the boy that he was, notwithstanding his attempts at bravado.

A few weeks after this occurrence at a Sabbath afternoon prayer meeting held under the auspices of the Young Men's Christian Association, there entered, two by two, a well known Bible class of young men, and bringing up the rear, with heads erect, and firm ringing foot-steps, came the Fearless Four, led by Ned Thornton.

Aunt Katy, brave old missionary Aunt Katy, had done her work well. Love for a perishing soul had prompted her desire to rescue it, an unquestioning faith in the God she served had given her the needed courage.

Is not her example worthy of imitation?

The Beauties of License.

What a beautiful consistency is license law! Men buy the right to set up shops for the sale of poison. The municipality takes their money and gives them authorized right. The effect of the poison is to make men lose control of their bodies and reel and fall prone in the street; to inflame their passions and set them quarrelling, fighting and killing. But the moment the dram-seller has prevailed upon a man to drink sufficient of the poison to effect him, and he reels, falls, quarrels, or fights, the same law which authorizes the sale, and so the effect, pounces upon the poor victim and handcuffs him, judges him, penitentiaries him. Logical, isn't it? Sell a man snuff and fine him for sneezing! —Son of Temperance.

Righteous Partisanship.

"When coal in the mines; but not in the grate, will warm us; flour in the barrel, but not in the loaf, feed us; and wool on the sheep's back, but not woven in the loom, clothe us, then a public sentiment not manufactured into ballots and welded by the esprit du corps, of a dominant party, will overthrow the rum party in America. We must gather up this dormant sentiment, condense it in the electric battery of the ballot box, and send it tingling along the wires of law. O sacred ballot of the freeman, thine arrows are sharp in the hearts of the king's enemies, but never so sharp as when cast with the mighty momentum of righteous partisanship for the officer behind the ordinance, the law enforcer back of the law.—Frances E Willard.

NOTES FROM CONNECTICUT.

FROM THE "CONNECTICUT HOME." Carswell Division of Milford is endeavoring to solve the perplexing question as to what shall be done for "Good of the Order," and has adopted an interesting plan. A social committee is appointed the first evening of every quarter, and that committee arranges the programme for each evening during the quarter, same member or members being responsible for each meeting, and required to provide something of value as well as entertaining. For instance, for last Monday evening, four members read papers on the life and works of Frances Willard and other W. C. T. U. leaders. One member will soon give a talk on 'Prohibitory Legislation in Connecticut,' and another on Constitutional Prohibition. The music, etc., are not forgotten, but judiciously interspersed. Monday evening, (Feb. 4,) this division enjoyed a talk from P. G. Chaplin, Rev. A. P. Miller of New Haven, and some of the members of Good Will Division of that city sang for us. A delightful surprise was given us on the same evening by visiting delegations from Birmingham, H. B. French and Star of Hope Divisions, bringing together nearly 125 members. A very pleasant musical programme was enjoyed. Bro. Edwards played the banjo, Messrs. Wilhem and Wilcox the harmonicas, and Miss Stone of No. 42 sang. Among those present were M. W. A. Baldwin and P. G. W. P. Dorman. A collation was served. Let us hear what the other divisions are doing. Carswell Division, No. 18, Milford, voted at last meeting to give a public entertainment, devoting 50 per cent. of the net proceeds to the propagation fund of the Grand Division. A committee of five was appointed to carry out the matter. Who is next?

Hawley Division, No. 32, celebrated its first anniversary Feb. 5. G. W. P. Baldwin, G. W. A. Kemmers and G. Sen. Emil Hohenthal were present, also about 40 members of South Manchester and Manchester divisions. C. C. Munsell, P. W. P. of Capitol Division, was introduced and signed the constitution. H. H. Quintard, P. G. S., made the welcoming address, and was followed by G. W. P. Baldwin. Then came singing by Jennie Curtis, Bell Cheney, Sophia Gross, and Mr. Yates; recitations by A. R. Carter and A. Easterby; remarks by G. Sen. E. Hohenthal, and reading by G. W. A. Kemmerer. Hawley Division started with 17 members and now has over 80 and is still growing.

Rising Star Section, Cadets of Temperance at Five Mile river, is getting along finely. Why should not other divisions take hold of this branch of juvenile work? Successfully conducted it becomes a source of strength to the divisions. Members desiring information concerning methods, &c., can apply to Mrs. Josephine C. Craw, Rowayton, who is in charge.

Huntington Division recently held an entertainment and cleared $12, and now they propose to purchase a set of emblems. The G. W. A., Miss Mary Kemmerer was generally commended for the able manner in which she presided over the Grand Division at its recent session.

A new division was instituted at Stoney Creek last week Wednesday evening; particulars next week.

Manchester Division, No. 33, at a recent meeting initiated ten new members.

Birmingham Division is to have a visit from Huntington Division next Saturday evening, (16th.)

The Rev. M. H. Pogson of New York city has recently spoken in the interest of the order at Stratford, Birmingham and Milford; at the two first named places under the management of the propagation committee, at the latter employed by Carswell Division. There was fair attendance at each meeting.

Both South Manchester and Star Hope Divisions are arranging for anniversary meeting to be held Feb. 22.

In 1888, Dr. B. W. Richardson, in his address before the British Medical Temperance Association as its president, said: "I speak from individual and from collective experience. I believe that the adhesion of all the profession to our cause, would instantly effect the death rate. If the whole profession could begin to teach total abstinence to-morrow, the death rate would, I believe, fall two in the thousand, and that would be an immense gain."

Bonfort's Wine and Spirit Circular thus accounts for the defeat of prohibitory amendment in West Virginia: "West Virginia was saved from the grasp of fanaticism by an appeal to manhood and to popular intelligence. During months past tons of literature have been scattered broadcast over the State, and scarcely a county but has heard a public speaker for our cause, and wherever possible a joint debate."
