

Roy's Trial.

My precious boy, do nothing that you cannot ask God to bless. It will save you many a heart-ache, said Mrs. Eaton, as kissing her darling son for the last time, she came down the gangway of the splendid Atlantic steamer, and left her handsome Roy standing upon its deck.

Roy was en route for San Francisco, in charge of his mother's friends who were to consign him to the care of his uncle upon his arrival in that city. The voyage from New York to Aspinwall lasted eight days. The captain of the Colon was just the kind of a man to win and hold the heart of an adventurous boy like Roy, and the two soon became good friends.

As the vessel neared the Isthmus of Panama, where the passengers were to exchange steamers, Roy's spirits fell. He dreaded the separation. The gong rang for the last dinner aboard the Colon and the tables were soon filled.

Sit by me, to-day, Roy, said the captain, and the boy was delighted with the honor.

That dinner was unusually gay, and wine, at the captain's expense, began to circulate freely.

Everybody drank to the captain's toast, viz: My passengers! May our friendship have no wreck, and may we meet gain at the end of our life voyage.

Everybody drank but Roy, whose tiny goblet remained untouched. How is this? said the captain, observing it. Don't you understand the process, Roy? Tip off you glass, my boy, and show your sympathy.

I do wish it, captain, with all my heart, modestly replied Roy. Then drink to the wish like any manly boy should.

Roy's face was crimson for the attention of all around him had been arrested by the captain's loud tones. His answer was very low, Please excuse me, sir. I cannot drink wine.

Nonsense! What have you against this? It is older than you are, yet wouldn't hurt a baby. Be a man. Here! and he lifted it to Roy's lips. I cannot, captain, for at last, 'Tt biteth like a serpent and stingeth like an adder.

This is not the time or place in which to spout a boy's temperance speech, said the captain, as he turned coldly away from him, ordering his guests and his own glasses refilled. But, again, as though determined not to be repulsed by a mere child, he spoke;

Come Roy we have had too many pleasant hours together to part this way, drink once like a fine fellow. It is a very little thing, and oblige me.

It was a very little thing, seemingly, to simply swallow those few drops of delicious wine and retain the captain's friendship. It was a very great thing to be conscious that many eyes were curiously watching him, and lips sneering at what seemed his childish obstinacy, but far above these arose his mother's last words. A narrow blue ribbon was tied in his button-hole. It represented the Loyal Temperance League pledge, which he had vowed to keep.

Could he ask God to bless this most unnecessary step in what might be to him, as it had been to thousands of others, the path to ruin? He looked appealingly in the tempter's face.

Captain! I will do anything else to oblige you, but this—please excuse me—for—(here his voice faltered) my mother's sake.

It is of no consequence—I despise prigs, replied the captain, and turning his shoulder to the embarrassed boy he took no farther notice of him.

Roy's heart swelled, but not with indignation. A great lump filled his throat. He was afraid that he was going to do that girlish thing, to cry, and whispering,

Will you allow me to leave, sir, put his napkin to his mouth. Certainly! was the captain's coldly polite reply, scarcely noticing the little bow with which Roy acknowledged the permission. It was hours after when the vessel landed in Aspinwall, and during that time Roy seemed to have lived a century of gloom and sadness. Then followed the confusion of unloading and landing, and amid the bewilderment of it all Roy forgot all but the good times he had on the beautiful Colon.

The cars which were to convey the passengers to Panama were nearly filled, when Roy, turning, saw the captain standing at the depot with a group of men around him in a fog of cigar smoke.

Gratitude for the captain's kindness, and a doubt whether he would notice him, were in conflict in his mind. The former conquered.

Approaching him he timidly held out his hand.

Good-bye, captain. I wished you were going with us, said Roy.

Ah! it is you, my boy, and not angry either? Well, midget, I like your pluck if I don't approve of your strict temperance principles. For your mother's sake! Ah! there's the rub. Honor her, and you'll make a man. Forgive me, Roy. I'm a rough, old fellow at times, but I'll take stock in you, my boy. Good-bye, with a hearty shake. Good-bye, with a still heartier. May we voyage together once more. And thus ended Roy's first trial.—N. B. Eyester in Californian Exchange.

Prohibition in Maine and Iowa.

After thirty years of thorough testing, the verdict of the vast majority of the citizens of Maine is unqualifiedly favourable to prohibition. Every declaration of opinion that comes from responsible sources, every deliverance on the subject in the public press, or the political platform, or from the lips or pens of those qualified to judge, affirms the benefit and effectiveness of prohibition. Official records verify the statement that, before the enactment of this law, distillers, breweries and saloons were in operation day and night throughout the State. Today, although drinking is not wholly abolished, not a distillery, brewery or open saloon is plying its vocation within the borders of the State.

In 1884 Iowa placed on her statute books a stringent prohibitory law. At the time of its enactment the liquor traffic held undisputed possession of the field. Distillers and breweries and saloons were conducting their business openly in every part of the State, and no successful effort had been made to restrict or restrain them.

At the end of four years, Governor Larabee himself an opposer of prohibitory legislation when first proposed, declared that in eighty-five of the ninety-nine counties of the State the law is absolutely effective, and in the remaining fourteen partially enforced, with a steady advance towards complete enforcement.

More than half the county gaols are vacant; pauperism and crime are steadily decreasing; intelligence and morality are advancing; the resources of the State are rapidly developing, and prosperity is said to follow every department of trade and every branch of industry.—Philadelphia Medical and Surgical Report.

TEMPERANCE NEWS AND NOTES.

IN JAPAN—Three thousand years ago, the Emperor Buu was a strict Prohibitionist of the modern type. He made his own prohibitory laws, and saw that they were executed. He did not have any courts around him to explain away their meaning. A violation of prohibitory laws was punished by death. With some modification these laws were afterwards introduced into Japan. They were "in full force and virtue" there for nearly a thousand years. There is no reliable information that they damaged Japan morally or politically. They passed away long ago, to the damage of the country.

Intemperance, according to the Tokio paper, is now a growing and threatening evil in Japan. One single liquor costs the people $60,000,000 annually, an amount equal to the entire annual expenses of the Government; and in its manufacture one-fifth of the annual rice crop is consumed. What is left affords a short allowance for food. No rice is exported from Japan.
