"Natalie, Natalie!" came again the sharp voice from the cottage window. The girl down the path raised her head and turned slowly towards the house.

Natalie was only a peasant girl, dressed in the quaint costume of the capton-but her crimson skirt was fine and soft, and the black velvet of her bodice heavy with dainty silver chains hung from her shoulders and fastened at the points of her bodice. "Yes, matrina, it is snowing up there; forgive me for neglecting you, but I can- How did you get here?" not help watching it. Would to heaven I could forget!" The girl's voice was full of sad pathos, and letting my book fall from my listless hands, I fell to wondering what romance, or probable superstition, was connected with the snow-storm of the mountain. I had been lounging here for four weeks now, opposite Lucerine-climbing the hills or making little sobbed for joy. After a little we sat down voyages about the four lakes. "Oh, it is so hard to bear; they say I shall forget it by and by: but I never shall." Her voice rose excitedly over the last sentence.

"Tell me what it is that you cannot forget, dear Natalie."

"Yes I will tell you. You have been down the lake and over the St. Gothard pass-you know just how far it is on the other side of the mountains. I was born over there. I am an Italian, then, by birth-but oh, I love the Schweiz, the beautiful home of my adoption. Only the mountain over there-Pilatus. I hate, and curse the dreadful mountain!" she shuddered and sighed heavily.

"Madre died when I was born, and the dear Swiss matrina who took me to her heart and made me her god child the day my mother died, brought me here to her WOOLLEN MILLS home to be her daughter. She had a son then-oh, he was so fair and gentle and brave in the childhood days when we played and studied together; and oh, he was fairer and nobler as a man, when the years had passed and I stood beside him a tall maiden—a woman by reason of my love for him, my brave lost Franz.
