

The Frozen Bridegroom.

Unconscious of her own beauty seemed Alice Gray, the minister's daughter and belle of the G.—as, followed by her dog Brutus—a large black animal of the Newfoundland breed—she strolled along one morning in June, by the banks of the sun-scrimosed Red River, her broad straw hat hanging by its strings to one white rounded arm, her long, dark chestnut hair falling in natural curling ringlets to her hollow back, her oval cheeks glowing with rich warmth, her brown eyes beaming bright, and such a sweet expression beneath her arched brows.

With the keen pleasure of hearing, she watched the nimble squirrel clatter up and down the trunks of the trees, the golden circle flashing through the tinted mist, and the flocks of pretty pigeons shooting with whistling wings over the tall poplars.

Suddenly a blast of wind blew the girl's hat from her arm into the river. Brutus, springing after it, soon had it in his mouth, but while mounting the steep vine-covered bank, he was caught in some strong tendrils. When striving vainly to extricate himself, he must have broken his legs but for a stranger, who, emerging from a mound not far off, ran and rescued him.

As the dog deposited the hat in the hand of his mistress, she blushed deeply, and thanked the stranger, who she noticed was a tall handsome fellow, with rich brown complexion, blue eyes, and coal black hair.

His father, who had been attracted by the furious barking of the dog, now arriving, added his thanks to those of his daughter. During the conversation that followed, the young man gave his name as Henry Morton, and learning that he was an artist, got here from New York city to sketch northwest scenery. Mr. Gray cordially invited him to his house.

'Have you yet come upon anything of interest?' he inquired as they walked toward his dwelling.

'Oh, yes sir,' answered the artist look straight at Alice, whom he thought the most interesting of anything he had yet seen.

Arrived at the house, he passed in the presence of Mr. Gray and his daughter, the picture of the hat he had ever known.

His visit was the prelude to many others, and in due time, the young people mutually attracted, he and Alice were engaged.

This was in November; the wedding day was appointed for January, 1873.

On the morning of this day, Henry was up early in the little house, about five miles north of Georgetown where he boarded. As the marriage service was to be performed at night, he intended to start for Georgetown during the afternoon.

On the previous day, however, having left the minister's house at four o'clock for a settlement a few miles to the south, where he had expected to be detained until the following day, he would probably be looked for from that direction. He is, however, transacted his business much sooner than he anticipated, and had gained his lodgings before.

The wedding morning was cold and gloomy, the wind whistled dolefully and dark clouds presaged a storm.

At about ten o'clock the snow began to fall thick and fast.

At four o'clock, Harry left the public house for Georgetown. Along the road the snow was up to his knees, while in some places it had drifted to the height of six or ten feet. As he proceeded the way became more difficult. He was obliged to walk a long distance to get round the huge drifts, so that hours passed ere he had made the two first miles of his journey. The wind, blowing furiously, was keen and biting, seeming to pierce him to the very vitals. He felt chilled and benumbed, while the tremendous exertion he had already made nearly exhausted him.

Nevertheless, he passed on, almost smothered by the whirling clouds of snow, which, sweeping along before the icy cyclone, blinded and confused him.

Moving on as fast as his benumbed limbs would permit, a feeling of irresistible drowsiness stole over him, while now and then his brain seemed to go round and round, adding greatly to his confusion.

Here and there like sheeted spectres, towered great drifts, which seemed to whirl about, mocking him, as he waded on through billows and rifts, up to his arm-pits.

Suddenly a terrific gust swept down upon him, hurling him prostrate, face down in the icy tidal feet of snow. He staggered up, and pressed on, feeling, however, that his strength was fast leaving him, while that terrible keen, cold air—peculiar to the North West—seemed to turn to ice the very life-currents in his veins.

Wild and fiercer raged the storm. Whirlwinds of snow and particles of ice—demons of the frost, as they were—circled round the wanderer, seeming to shriek in his ears. But he still had sense enough left to realize that the shrieks he heard were those of the blast; although strange noises and curious sights, foreign to the storm, would now and then intrude on his bewildered brain, until he would suddenly start, and realize, with a feeling of inexpressible horror, that he had been walking in a drowsy, dozing half-dreamy state, which was fast getting the better of him.

At last, far ahead of him, he saw the twinkling light of the minister's dwelling.

He pressed on, his half-benumbed limbs feeling almost like leaden weights which he was compelled to drag after him.

And now all the elements seemed to conspire against him. The snow and ice dashed fiercely into his face, and it was only by superhuman exertions he could keep himself from falling down, and sinking at once into the cold sleep of the frozen.

He kept up, however, till within fifty feet of the minister's house, when he sank up to his arm-pits into snow filled hollow from which his little remaining strength refused to extricate him, and where he believed he must die.

Right ahead of him was the house of his beloved. Through the lighted window he beheld some of the invited wedding guests, and the minister, and could see beyond the beautiful group wreaths and other ornaments hung upon the wall in honor of the occasion. There, too, gleamed reddily and brightly, tantalizing his vision was the large Morning Glory stove, its naive windows showing plainly through the open doors leading into the back parlor.

Yes, all was light and warmth within, while the faces he saw were bright and happy, for no person there expecting him yet dreamed of his situation.

No, they would watch for him yet; so he must perish miserably out there in the

and his paradise, as it were, before him and added within his clasp!

The thought was terrible, almost maddening—and yet he had not the power to free his half frozen limbs from the deep snow-drift.

His eyes were now becoming dim, but he could still see those lighted windows although now and then a strange mist seemed to gather before him.

There they still were, those happy wedding guests, and soon a white curtain which had hitherto hidden one of the windows was raised, and he beheld the table flashing with its silver and china, set for the wedding, and containing its tempting repast.

And now an entrancing vision came and stood by the window—his own Alice radiant as an angel in her wedding attire.

A little apart from the guests she stood and took out her watch, looking to see how near the time when she should expect him.

He new such was the thought by the blushed and sweet smile to hide which she turned her face toward the window, her eyes seeming to fall directly upon the hollow from which her perishing lover was watching her.

The mist now was gathering thickly before him obscuring that bright vision.

He raised an arm and shouted loudly, but the angry howling winds drowned his faintest voice. His head sank back, and the troway stupor, which had so long been troubling him, gave the mastery, overpowered him.

The slumber from which there is no awakening was creeping upon him, and with a sudden sensation, as of something dragging him lower and lower down under the snow, he became unconscious.

Wondering he at length opened his eyes to find himself lying in a warm, brightly lighted room. Terrible pains racked his limbs, but two friends were around him, and all they could do to relieve him, and his head was pillowed on the bosom of Alice Grey, her sweet brown eyes looking down on his face.

"Saved! saved! See, he has come too!" he wildly cried, showering kisses upon his face.

He learned that he had been saved by the dog Brutus, which had fortunately discovered him in time, and while endeavoring to drag him to the house, had, by being barking attracted thither Mr. Grey and several of the guests, who, expecting to meet him some distance ahead in the other direction, had just started out with their guns.

They found about half way between the hollow and the house, the noble dog, with its teeth fastened in Henry's coat collar, by which it held above the snow the head of the young man, covered with stiffened locks and myriads of icicles.

A few days after, Henry being almost as well as ever, the postponed marriage service was performed before an additional number of guests, present among whom was the dog, which had so nobly saved the bridegroom's life.

ANTI-CLINKER SELF-FEEDING STOVE, with something like a Furnace attachment for heating two or more rooms.

1 Anti-Clinker, Self-Feeding
FURNACE.

The above Furnace is said to be by competent judges in Fredrickton, the most perfect furnace yet made.

The Subscriber sold 3 of the above celebrated stoves last year, and they gave general satisfaction.
The following are a few of many testimonials the author has received in approbation of the Stove.

[From His Honor the Lieutenant Governor,]
Fredericton, Nov Brunswick,
Sept. 10th, 1874.
SIR—One of Spear & Co's No. 2 Anti-Clinker stove is used in Government House last winter. It gave entire satisfaction. I consider its arrangements superior to any pattern I have yet seen.
(Signed),
M. A. LOTTIMMER, M. R. S. TILLEY.

[From S. T. Parsons, Woodstock, N. B.,]
September 20th, 1874.
DEAR SIR—Yours of the 9th inst. asking how like the No 13 Anti-Clinker I bought of you, last fall, is found, and in reply I can say that we are perfectly satisfied with it. I use it in my front parlor, and find it very convenient. It keeps the room at an even temperature all winter long.
It warms the whole upper part of the room.
It is cheerful light, and gives all the heat it needs to get on. It is a perfect success. If I could not another I would not take $30 for it.

Respectfully,
S. J. PARSONS &
P.S. The price of the above No 13 Stove was $35.

[From Mr. McKeake, Esq, Dry Goods Merchant,]
Fredericton, Sept. 1874.
MR. A. LOTTIMMER—Dear Sir, I take pleasure in recommending the Anti-Clinker self-feeding stove, made and sold by James Spear & Co.
as having been used by me for two years in my dry goods store, and as not cost for repairs. It is so day and night.

high state of cultivation, cutting last year about 10 tons of hay, with a good Horse and Shingle mill on other buildings. It is well watered and has a fine falling spring within a few yards of the house. There is also a water-mill on the premises containing Grist, Single Saw and Shingle machines.
The farm will be sold separate from the Mill,
the purchaser so desires. A bargain may be secured. Inquire of
C. BRODERICK,
