For the Colonial Farmer NOTES FROM GRAND LAKE STREAM

MR. EDITOR .- The having season throughout the State is about over, and from several accounts which have come to my knowledge. it is far below the average of other years, although not so bad as was at first expected. Throughout Washington county it is a very poer crop; in Penobscot it is said to be fair in most places, while in Aroestock it is as good as it has been known to be for years The petate crop is a comparative failure, chiefly on high land, the incessant drought of the present summer having "burnt them out." All grains are below the yield of former years. Apples are abundant and l have not heard of any trouble from worms as Business remains dull. A large number of the manufacturing companies have shut down, and those who still remain running, go on a small scale and low wages.

The work of re-building the Jackson Brook tannery is being pushed forth vigorously. The Shaw Bros. deserve credit for their indomitable pluck and enterprise, and they evidently keep their large firm affeat where a great many others, with as many liabilities and expense of carrying on such a large stroke of business, would ultimately sink.

I might here mention to you that we live on the west branch of the Schoodic Lakessome twenty-five lakes or so which extend from Springfield, where they join the Penobscot waters, to Princeton, where they flow into the western branch of the St. Croix, or Schoodic river. Grand Lake Stream is the outlet of the largest lake in the range. It flews through a beautiful ample with prudent management for the does this backing and filling mean? valley connecting Grand Lake with Big Lake, a distance of three miles. age, at the time when this place was the most patronized by Ashermen, and Mr. for Mr. Gould to make ten dollars after supper transporting them and their baggage to Grand Lake Stream. At that time there was not a settler at the Stream, with the exception of Mr. Gould, three miles below: and as they could not buy any provisions at the place, as they can now, they usually brought a large cargo with them, and besides their previsions, their tents, canoes, and numerous other things. The "Old Elm Stump" where they landed (a short distance below Mr. Gould's) is the subject of many pleasant memories to old and young.

I will conclude by saying that I don't know why the village could have ever received the name of the Stream also, which is not at all appropriate, instead of the splendid poetical name of "Saptogus," the tribute that was left it by Dr. Bethune.
