Never Despair.

RS. PEASLEE had been a widow that she had so much regretted Peaslee -oh, no. Indeed, if the truth were told, she had rather felt as if Peaslee were doing the handsome thing by her when he caught the measles.

He was seventy-eight or nine before h did this, and having escaped the contagion during his first childhood, he had a perfect right to it in his second. But it went hard with him, and after an interesting illness of four days, during which he "swore the very hair off her head," as Mrs. Peaslee informed her neighbor, Mrs Brown, he passed away. He was a man of property, and of course Mr. Paisley wept becomingly at his funeral, and made herself as gloomy as possible with crape folds and bombazine.

She employed Paul Julius, the villiage poet, to write sixteen verses by way of an obitary notice-verses which Mrs. Julius, who was not ramantic, declared touching enough to ring tears out of a gridiron. She also had a tombstone set up to his memory, with a very-much bent-over angel, with spreading wings, reclining against an urn which looked like patent coffee-pot, and underneath the announcement of Mr. Peaslee's age, was inscribed this sentence from the Spanish

" Mas vale tarde que nunca." She had asked one of her nephews, wild young fellow just entering his senior year at college, for some expressive sentence from some foreign language to put on his Uncle Eben's tombstone, and the young rascal had imposed this-"Better late than never!" upon her, assuring her and saidthat it meant-'There is rest in Heav.

When Peaslee's will was opened, the widow was raging mad. All his property had been willed to a certain Jonathan Ebnezer Peaslee, a relative of his, and the widow had only her "thirds." But she charged the tombstone, angel and all to the estate, and recovered the price

After that, finding she was a desperate woman, Jonathan Ebenezer bought out her "thirds," and the widow set up a house for herself. Directly crape began to give way to lavender ribbons. And when a widow begins to don lavender, the fact is significant.

Mrs. Peaslee was still young. owned to thirty, but was really about forty and a very good-looking woman. I suppose she had an undoubted right to look after a second husband. Barzilla Bodge was her first flame. The courtship was made easy. Everything was levely, and the course of true love ran smooth. The wedding dress, white silk, with pale lavender trimmings, was ready, the day was set and the cards printed. But, to use the language of the ninteenth century, life had soured on Brazilla, and a wer' ' fore the wedding, he was seized morbus, and in a few hours

e was still a widow. She d mourning—it was by no and wore it three months. ime, she got a little billious, and black was not becoming, so she went back to the lavender. Squire Legro began to visit her. The squire was a man of wealth, and Mrs. Peaslee considered herself very fortunate when he proposed.

Again the bridal day was appointed. Aut, alas! fate was still unpropitious, and stepped in between the widow and her fond hopes of felicity, in the shape of Annie Tracy, the squire's seamstress, who threatened to sue the squire for breach of promise. This was too much for that worthy gentleman, and he packed up his movables and escaped. His hat was found on the shore of the river, together with a note directed to Annie and the widow. saying that he preferred death to disgrace, and announcing his intention " to shuffle off," etc.

His body was never found, and a year afterwards, he was seen in the flesh, full one hundred and eighty pounds of it, along with his wife, and a pair of twin babies. So, of course, he did not die when he expected to.

A month or two after the squire's ex odus, John Nugent came to the town to engage in the very striking business of putting up lightning rods. Immediately the widow was seized with a terrible dread of lightning. She had rods put on all her buildings, hen-house included.

Mr. Nugent teck a room at her house When it thundered, she flew to him for protection. He protected her. When it did not thunder, she was afraid it was going to, and sought of him cos olation, He consoled her. There was more lightning than usual that summer, and Mr. Nugan had his hands full. Altogether it was delightful time. was happy.

August the fifth was set for the wed ding. But, alas! on that day of all others appeared at the Widow Peaslee's from loor, inquiring for Timothy Jenkins, a freckle-faced woman, with five children Mrs. Peaslee told her that she had not the honor of Mr. Jenkins' acquaintance. And she called Mr. Nugent down to protect her from the woman's abuse. At the first glimpse of him, the woman darted forward and seized him by the arm. f "Oh, Timothy, you heartless, unfeeling man you, to desert your affectionate wife and all your interesting children."

And then there was a fearful scene. during which a good deal of hair changed hands and everything was badly mixed up. And it all ended by Mrs. Jenkins marching Jenkins off with a young one on each of his shoulders, and the others hanging to his legs. Still the Widow Peaslee was a widow. At first she thought of falling sick, like the heroines in novels, when great emergencies occur, but on second thoughts, she changed her mind, and sought consolation in various little proverbs. Scraps of poetry, also, came to relieve her mind. She thought favorably of the wonderful production which begins-"If at first you don't succeed, try, try again." Then she remembered the spider --

"Three times the spider tried his web to fasten to the beam;

quoth the widow courageously, and she bathed her eyes, for she had been crying a little, and prepared a plate of toast and jelly for old Peter Pray, who was rich and

Mrs. Peasley took some boarders-only single men. James Juniper was one them. Juniper had charge of a blasting operations on a ledge of rocks a little distance off. The widow fascinated him, and in due time they were engaged. The day before they were to be married, blast of powder went off without giving any notice, and as poor Juniper happened at the time to be standing directly over it, he went up. When he made his as cent, he had two legs and two arms when he descended, it was found that one of each was missing.

The widow received him at her house -what remained of him. He lifted his powder-blackened face at the sight of her. and said, faintly -

"Hannah, are you going to give me up? Because, if you are, I won't have doctor's a-sawing off my bones; but if you'll stick to me, then let 'em saw.'

But the widow was loyal, and James was raised up to life again, though one of his legs is a wooden one, and he has only one arm with which to embrace Mrs. Juniper. So you see, that patience and perseverance always bring forth their fruits, and when you feel inclined to despair, think of the Widow Peaslee, and renew your courage.

A little squint-eyed Chicago boy pran ced up to his mother, one day this week,

"Ma, hain't I been real good since I've begun goin' to Sunday school?' "Yes, my lamb," answered the mater

"And you trust me now, don't you "Yes, darling," she replied again.

"Then," spoke up the little innocent what makes you keep the cookies up i the pantry same as ever? A strange look entered that mother's eye, as she endeavoured to solve her little
