Millaby's Money.

ELL, we are in luck," said Mrs. Millaby, seating herself on the edge of the table where Katie, her dark eyed daughter, was industriously employed in shelling peas.

into the dim future, for Katie Millaby was money in Lawyer Luckey's hands after engaged to be married to an enterprising this. What's that? The postman! Give professional Co-partnership as Barristers and Attorneys, under the name and style of young mechanic in the neighborhood, and me the letter, Katie, quick!' she was wondering how far one piece of muslin would go towards her simple trousseau, and whether a silk dress was absolutely one of the indispensibles. "How, mother?" said she. "Has old Mr. Riverleigh decided to keep the front room with the alcove?" For the Millabys, mother and daughter, kept their heads above water by means of halk-a-dozen boarders, and a wearying sort of livlihood they found it. "Old Mr. Riverleigh, indeed!" said Mrs. Millaby, with a toss of her head. "What should you say, Katie, if we could set old Mr. Riverleigh and all the rest of the grumblers affoat? What should you say of our days ?" Katie opened wide her lovely brown eyes-eyes that deepened almost into black at the least excitement.
