'Hence you have sold yourself for gold. Well, I only hope it will bring you happiness. Good evening, Miss Dalmer.' And raising his hat, and bowing low, Guy Foster was gone.

Ellen Dalmer watched him out of sight, then, with a sigh, she proceeded in doors. Was she sorry? Perhaps so. She didn't allow herself any time to answer the question, for she busied herself with her toilette until the old man who was to crown her ambition arrived. As for Guy face look as if I had been happy? I need Foster, his feelings of despair soon gave scarcely ask, since you have eyes. I was way to those of indignation. So the years passed. Guy Foster had left the neighborhood before the wedding took place, in order to resume his profession, that of law. At the end of five years, we find him in London, with a large and rapidly increasing practice. Save that he is stouter and manlier, ther? very little alteration in his looks since the day we first saw him.

He was seated in his office, busily immersed in law papers, one day; he did not hear the tap at his door. A woman's voice aroused him.

'Excuse me, sir, but there was no one to announce me. Can I see Mr. Fos-

'Mrs. Howard, I believe. What can I do for you?'

'Perhaps you may think me foolish, but, since the Admiral's death I don't think his lawyer has done his best. I've determined to call in other aid. Your name being known to me I resolved to call here.' Guy Foster bowed stiffly. He had heard of the Admiral's death. 'I do not wish to interfere, Mrs. Howard. it would be better to keep with the firm that the Admiral trusted while living.' There was a look of agony on the woman's face. He never could know what pain his words caused her. The cold man before her evidently did not guess her real reason for coming. 'Very well, Mr. Foster. Of course may I expect you?' she asked. 'I can hardly promise, my time is so much engaged. You may expect me at any hour.'

And with this, Guy Foster found himself showing the stately lady to her car riage. He pretended not to see the hand stretched out to him as she bade him good afternoon. He merely bowed and retir-
