It was post-marked my ear, answered, 'You'll be sorry if you in the city at five o'clock of the previous | do.' afternoon, yet it was directed in a hand I had never expected to see again save when I looked with tearful eyes over a bundle of yellow old letters tied up carefully in a corner of my desk at home. It was curious, I thought, that this rather peculiar chirography should be duplicat ing for the last hour, and the halls had ed. Then I observed, with a start, that the middle name in the direction was not that which belongs to me, but one which I had adopted for two or three years of my childhood, preferring it to the family name which my parents gave me. I had outgrown this whim and returned to my baptismal name; the friend referred to always took a sort of pleasure in remind ing me of this and several other childish farcies which we had held in common.

I don't think I am naturally superstitious, but it would be difficult to describe the effect of this letter upon my mind. It was not merely the nature of the communication, but its entire unexpectedness, that made it impressive. I read and reread it carefully. The handwriting, if not precisely the same as that of my friend, certainly resembled it very strongly, and though I had with me none of the actual writing to compare with it I felt reasonably sure that my memory, on this point was trustworthy. After thinking carefully over my list of acquaintances, I felt certain that there was no thought. But who, I reasoned again, one of them who would be willing to play a practical joke of such a nature, and I knew of no one in the city who had ever heard Annie's name. Then, too, there was the middle name of childish fancy which I had never signed since the days when Annie was my sole correspon-
