O think of things coming to such a pass as this!' my mother went on. dolefully shaking her head, as she of dropped the sugar into the cups. 'Dear, dear, the ups and downs of this

'By George, mother, look out, or you'l have the tea over!' cried I irritably, as my mother nearly brought about such a castrophe in handing me my cup.

'Goodness, John! why don't you take hold of it, then! I declare I'm that put out!' exclaimed my mother, with an emphasis on the 'that' which seemed to hint that, under the circumstances, any little irregularities were perfectly excus-'Why, what's the row?' said I, vulgarly and ungraciously, thinking that perhap it would be better to hear the whole story at once, and get it over, knowing well that I must hear it some time. 'Has Mary broken another window, or some o the best dinner service, or-'

'No, no-it's nothing to do with Mary John. It's something I read in the paper this morning.' 'Indeed!' said I, with a resigned sigh as I broke the shell of my egg, 'is there to be a potato famine? have coals gone up again? or-' 'Do be quiet, John, and don't worry one so,' my mother broke in ; 'you'd never guess, not if you were to try from now till Christmas. I don't believe you ever heard the gentleman's name This enigmatical m de of speaking di not surprise me; I was accustomed to being as it was, a peculiarity of my mother's; so I answered calmly: 'Then I certainly shall not attempt t guess it. Do you propose enlightening me, though ?' 'Oh, you can read for yourself; its there in the paper.' My mother was evidently annoyed a my lack of interest, so, rousing myself, trying to throw off the evil humour that clung to me this morning; I said. 'What's the man been doing, mother and how does it affect you?"

'It doesn't affect me,' replied she, little molified; 'only I once knew himin a way, that is-for, of course, the Major moved in a much higher circle than such as we. Eh, dear! such pleasant ways he had with him, when he came to see your father about the farm-bless me! that's sixteen years and more back.'

'Then it must have been before we left Thornton,' said I, carelessly. What's his

'I don't suppose you'll remember anything about him, John, you were too young; but you'll recollect Hetty, maybe -a stout, lusty young womon with red hair-stayed with us a good bit, and a nicer, handier girl I wouldn't wish for. Well, she came to me straight from the Grange, and that's where Major Douglas used to live. He owned a deal of land about; your poor father's farm belonged to him too.'

'And what's wrong with him? Has he run through the property?'

'Worse than that,' said my mother solemnly. 'There were queer tales flying about here even in our time. You see he'd been twice married, had Major Douglas, and the son he had by the first wife was a wild, harum-scarum sort of lac always. I've heard it said his father was forever paying his debts. Goodness. John! I couldn't tell you the heaps and heaps of money I was told that boy cost the poor Major.' My mother paused, and looked at me across the teapot, as if expecting me to make a remark; but as I only looked at her, stirred my tea, and said nothing, she went on. Well, the last I heard from Thornton was that he'd sold the estate, and left the Grange. Your Aunt Jane did say was all along of his son. It's all in the papers about him now. I suppose," she concluded, shaking her head mournfully, 'I suppose he was fast for some ready money, and so he signed a name he hadn't ought to.' . Then it was a forgery,' said I, and suddenly I thought of my lean prisioner. 'What sort of a man was he?' I asked eagerly.

'A thorough gentleman from the crown of his head to the sole of his foot,' answered my mother promptly. 'What made him do it passes me altogether. It was trust money he had in keeping for some one else; as far as I can understand, he intended to put it back, poor fellow! before it could be missed. The papers say he never touched it, mind you -it was found out too soon; but for all that he's got penal servitude for five years.'

'But what was he like-personally, I mean? Was he tall and thin, with gray hair and moustache, finely-cut features, dark eyes-?'

'That's just him,' my mother interrupt ed; 'though, when I saw him last, his' hair was near as brown as yours. Well' well, to think of him then! a gayer kinder-hearted man did'nt live. It's quite upset me, it has; and worse than all, they had his daughter up to give evidence aganst him. The poor girl fainted afterward, and they had to carry her from the court. The paper says it was mostly through what she said he was convicted. Poor child! she can't be much more than fourteen or fifteen. Let's see; she was born twelve months before-'

The rest of my mother's reminiscences were lost upon me; for, having finished my breakfast, I picked up the paper and read the story for myself. There it was in black and white, much as my mother had narrated it. It did not say in so many words that the son's extravagance had ruined the father; but, having given my imagination the reins, having fallen into that reverie, and heard that pale faced girl's pitiful wail, my fancy supplied all the rest.

I put the paper down, saying to myself as I prepared to strat for the office. "There's no doubt about it; the poor man's more sinned against than sinning." Thus ended the first act in the romance of my life.

. Seven years passed away. Seven years; during which time the most startling event that happened was the death of my poor mother. I will say nothing more about this; it has nothing to do with the story, and I loved her dearly.

I had left the little house next to Miss Sweetlove's; most of the furniture was sold. I occupied appartments in a dismally respectable terrace in the town, and very lonely I found them sometimes. I was head-salesman in our office now. getting a pretty good salary. Long ago 1 years I had never felt any touch of the tender passion," for I have distinct ecollections of a strange flutter in the region of the heart befalling me on that Sunday when the Miss Robinsons appeared in new blue bonnets; but those bonnets grew dirty, and the flutter died away. a'so remember a certain Fanny Price, whom I met at Miss Sweetlove's carpet dance; I forgot how many times I danced with her. I took her down to supper, pulled crackers with her, attended with solicitude to all her little wants, and looked, or tried to look, unutterable things the while; she apparently smiled ditto back to me. But, oh, false, deceiving Sanny Price! that day fortnight I heard rom Miss Sweetlove's own malicious lips that Fanny Price was no more, and that Sanny Grundy reigned in her stead.

It was my twenty-seventh birthday. This fact brought me no pleasure. I knew no one who would make me any presents, and I suppose that's what birthdays are generally welcome for. I, at least, saw nothing to rejoice at in having marched one step nearer the grave-one year nearer the solution of the terrible mystery -a span, perhaps, on the road to that undiscovered bourne" which most nortals contemplate, doubtless on account of its obscurity, and the knowledge that all must perforce travel thither.

The church bells were ringing loudly on that June morning; for it was Sunday, and the people in the street below were nurrying to their different places of worship. I could hear the subdued clatter of their footsteps plainly as I sat at my solitary breakfast.

Suddenly I formed a resolution. I would go to the parish church and hear the anthem; they had capital music there. In this way I would celebrate my natal lay. I soon dressed myself, and made one of the stream of people wending their way to church and chapel.

I had some distance to walk, and by the time I reached St. Mary's the congreation were singing the "Venite." "Put The Science of Life; Given away as a Special Premium to the subscribers of this paper. Silver Goods furne anywhere," I whispered to the verger. Accordingly, when I had put down my hat, and found my place, I became aware that the other end of the pew was already occupied by a young lady. Another look and I saw that she vas dressed in black, or something very dark. Another, and I noticed that she wore a thick veil. Then a lot of promiscuous glances, for I couldn't keep my eyes off her. There was I, instead of listening to the music I had come to hear, twisting and screwing my eyes into What lovely golden hair! What a pretty hand! What a graceful figure! There was such a nameless air of quiet sadness nanging about her. Had she lost her father, or mother, or -no, she was too young to have had a lover; no, she didn't ook like that sort of thing, &c. Thus I uminated, while the object of my speculaion seemed unaware even of my presence. ilad am I that she did not observe my ude and vulgar staring; there she sat or stood, absorbed apparently in her

I am ashamed to say that I have a very mperfect recollection of that service, the nusic of which I have every reason to uppose was good. I believe they were omewhere in the middle of the anthem, but what that anthem was I haven't the ghost of an idea; I only know that it chimed in very pleasantly with my meditations concerning my interesting

Well, they were in the midst of the aint sigh, and turning quickly, I was just in time to see the book slip from my fair neighbor's hand, and her arms drop heavily to her side, while she herself sank nelpless on to the seat. Here was a nice predicament for a bashful young man! I was at her side directly, trying to ouse her. An old gentleman from the pew behind came to my assistance, and gether we half led, half carried her out.

"She's fainted, poor thing! It's the cading journals throughout the country. This nagnificient Medal is of solid gold, set with nore than one hundred India diamonds of rare together we half led, half carried her out. eat," said the verger, as he hurried off We raised her veil. Ah, I was not mistaken! I think I never beheld so lovely a face, all set round in a frame of golden hair; but, oh! so pale and white-not one vestige of color even in the lips. "Poor thing! poor thing!" murmured the old gentleman, as he chafed her hands, and sprinkled her face with cold

Slowly the cold came fluttering back to her cheek and lip; slowly she opened her great blue eyes, and looked vaguely at first, then wonderingly; at last, starting up, "where am I?" she asked, looking from one to the other in perplexity. We told her how she had fainted, and we had carried her out of church.

The reputation it has attained, in consequence of the marvellous cures it has produced during the last half century, is a sufficient assurance to the public that it will continue to realize the happiest section of country there are persons, publicly known, who have been restored from alarming and even desperate diseases of the lungs, by its use. All who have tried it, acknowledge its superiority; and where its virtues are known, no one hesitates as to what medicine to employ to relieve the distress and suffering peculiar to pulmonary affections. CHERRY PECTORAL always affords instant relief, and performs rapid cures of the milder varieties of bronchial disorder, as well as the more formidable diseases of the lungs. As a safeguard to children, amid the distressing diseases which beset the Throat and Chest of Childhood, it is invaluable; for, by its timely use, multitudes are rescued and restored to health. This medicine gains friends at every trial, as the cures it is constantly producing are too remarkable to be forgotten. No family should be without it, and those who have once used it never will.
