One afternoon, when the sun was lowering itself in the west, leaving in the valleys shadows that the art of the painter could hardly equal for softness and variety of shades. I passed through historic Goliad, a small villiage on the limped San Antonio, and spurred my horse on toward the old Spanish mission, which reared itself as some antique structure, a link between the living present and the dead past. As I rode up the hill leading from the river, and at that time of the year fordable, the mission attracted my full attention. It was almost square, built of rough stone, and commanded full view of the whole country. The walls were thick, windows few, narrow and barred with rods of iron; and from the sides and ends, in tiers, were port holes, from which in former days, the muz les of guns peered forth at hostile men.

The mission had been transformed into a caravansary, and around its door played innumerable Mexican children, and dogs of the half-wolf species squatted in lazy attitudes in patches of sunshine that lay around. Groups of Mexican men and women lounged about, talking in their low, musical Spanish patois, smoking of vapor above their heads in fantastic that place.
