Now and then and as the object came slowly to the bed a robbery had been committed there by I quickly leveled the weapon and pulied some expert burglar, and with all the the trigger. It missed fire, and the burgefforts put forth to detect the thief or lar made for the closet again. Springing thieves, no clue had been obtained that from the bed, I clutched the villain by pointed with certainty in any direction.

It was generally supposed that some member or members of a regularly organized band of thieves, known to exist in that part of the country at the time of which I write, carried on the work.

In every instance the robber had got away with the plunder, leaving no distinct trace of how he came or how he

The landlord had a standing reward posted up in the bar-room and other places, of five hundred dollars for the apprehension of the guilty party.

I, perhaps, felt a greater interest in the affair than any other outsider: not from any danger of losing a great amount of money, for it was, unfortunately, not; in my possession, but because I had formed a warm attachment for that beautiful daughter of the proprietor of the Silverwing. I had indeed become infatuated with Eleanor, and had the blessed satis faction of knowing from her own sweet lips that my love was not bestowed in

For more than a year I had become frequent guest at her father's house, and each occasion had been one of exceeding happiness. The parents of my ideal knew that lancy for each other had ripened into a strong affection, and they most heartily encouraged the proposed

Eleanor at times wore a troubled look often in the midst of a spirited conversation would lapse into silence or burst into tears, and especially was this the case when reference was made to the disrepute her father's house was likely to fall into if the crimes perpetuated in it were much longer continued.

Her emotion showed a sensitive nature and a filial affection which strengthened my admiration, and led me to vow over and over again, with solemn oath, that would not rest until the rogues had been detected and punished.

My first investigation developed the fact that room 13 of the chamber was the one in which the greater number of robberies had taken place; but this was accounted for from the fact that it was the best room in the house, and the one usually occupied by parties of consider-only asked a trial as a test of his pledge My suspicions naturally fell upon the hostler, who was a shrewd fellow, faultless in deportment, but a man who kept his own counsel.

The more I thought of it, the more became certain that I had a clue.

These suspicions were conveyed to Eleanor and her father, who were some what surprised at first, but finally admitted that they were not, perhaps, groundless, and both promised their full cooperation in working up a plan to bring the criminal to the surface.

I had only got my net-work arranged as I supposed, for capturing the thief, when I was called away to attend to other and important business, which might detain me for a month.

I informed my host and Eleanor of my call to leave, and after getting a full in surance that they would play the part of detectives, according to the plans I had laid out, I took an affectionate leave of my affianced, promising to return at the earliest possible day.

I had not been away from the Silver wing more than a week, when my matters took such shape as to allow me to

I was glad it was so, for my heart, felt strangely sad away from the one who had awakened its first emotions of love, and I made haste to retrace my steps.
