A HARD CASD. Frost? At half past eight the following morning Ben Hadley called at the tavern and and fixed his eyes prudently on that page inquired for "the schoolma'am. of the arithmetic which contained the 'You mean Miss Frost,' said the landanswer to the question he had asked.

To him aritmetic was aritmetic, and it had never consider time spent over books wasted. Physically and in temperament he resembled his father more than his mother, and one way of expressing the same thing. this was fortunate. Mrs. Hadley was thin-lipped and acid with, with a large stion which followed. Unfitted as he was measure of selfishness and meanness. for the task of testing the knowledge of any other, Squire Hadley perceived that Her husband was pompous, and overthe new schoolma'am was an excellent estimated his own importance, but his wife's faults were foreign to his nature. an awkward discovery. He had lost the He was rather popular, though, as a man list of questions which the minister had and Ben in his turn, in spite of his mis prepared for him. put on airs. Ben surveyed Miss Frost, whom he saw for the first time, with approval, not unmingled with surprise. She was not the average type of teacher. Ben rather expected to meet an elderly female, tall and willowy in form, and wearing long ringlets. Such had been Miss Jerusha Colebrook, who had wielded the furule the year before.

'Are you the schoolma'am?' asked Ben, dubiously. Mabel smiled

'I suppose,' said she, 'that depends on whether I pass the examination.' 'I guess you'll pass,' said Ben. 'What makes you think so?' asked Mabel amused.

'You look as if you knew something, answered Ben, bluntly. · I hope appearances won't prove deceptive, said Mabel. 'Are you to be one of my scholars!' 'Yes said Ben. 'You look bright and quick.'

'Do I ?" said Ben. 'You can't always tell by looks,' he added, laughing, thus parodying her own words. 'Don't you like to study?'

' Well, I don't hanker after it. The fact is, said Ben, in a burst of confidence, 'I'm a pretty hard case. You say so because you are modest.

'No I don't; the last teacher said so Why, she couldn't do nothing with me.' 'You begin to alarm me,' said Mabel. ' Are there many hard cases among the

'I'm glad to hear that.' · Why?' asked Ben puzzled.

'Because,' said Mabel, 'I don't expect to have any trouble with you.' 'You dont !' said Ben, surprised.

'No, I like your face. You may be mischievous, but I am sure you are not

Ben was rather pleased with the complimet. Boy as he was, he was not insensible to the grace and beauty of the new teacher, and he felta thrill of pleasure at words which could scarcely have affected him if they had proceeded from Miss Jerusha Colebrook.

Mabel continued -' Don't you feel interested in study?'

'Not much, Ben admitted. 'You don't want to grow up ignorant, do you ?'

· Of course I want to know something, said Ben. 'If you improve your time you may some time be chairman of the School Committee, like your father.' Ben chuckled. 'That don't take much larnin', he said

'Don't it? I should think that it re quired a good scholar. Ben laughed again.

'Perhaps you think my father knows a good deal?' said he interrogatively. Ben seemed oh the brink of a danger ous confidence, and Mabel felt embarrassed. 'Certainly,' said she. 'He don't,' said Ben. 'Don't you ever tell, and I'll tell you something. Ide got Geography?' he asked.

'That aint it,' said Ben. 'Dad never went to school after he was twelve. I could cipher him out of his boots, and he aint much on spelling either. The other day he spelled straight s-t-r-a-t-e.'

'You mustn't tell me all this, said Mabel, gravely. 'Your father wouldn't Mabel, smiling; 'I will ask you some of like it.

'You won't tell him ?' said Ben, apprehensively, for he knew that his father would resent his indiscreet revelations. 'No, cerainly not. What is your name?

'Ben.'

'Shall I call you Ben or Benjamin?' Ben. Everybody calls me Ben.

When does the school commence: 'To-morrow morning, I say, Miss Frost
