CHAPTER VII. MABEL'S BOARDING-PLACE, AND WHAT TWO LADIES THOUGHT OF HER.

Ben's conversion [was sudden, and, as in most similar cases, he found a difficulty in staying converted. While his pride was flattered by the confidence reposed in him by Miss Frost, there were times when his old mischievous propensities almost overcame him. On the third day, as John Cotton was passing Ben's desk the latter thrust out his foot into the passage-way between the desks, and John tumbled over it, breaking his slate.

'What is the matter?' asked Mabel looking up from a book from which she was hearing a class.

'Ben Hadley tripped me up,' said John rubbing his person, and looking ruefuily at the broken slate.

'Did you, Ben?' asked Mabel. Ben was already sorry and ashamed, as he would not have been under any other teacher. With all his faults he was a boy of truth, and he answered, 'Yes,' rather sheepishly.

'You should be careful not to keep feet in the aisle,' said Miss Frost, quietly. 'I suppose you'll be willing to buy John a new slate.

'Yes,' said Ben, promptly, glad to have the matter end thus.

'I need a slate now,' grumbled John. 'I'll lend you mine,' said Ben, prompt ly, 'and buy you a better one than broke.' 'You might have broken my legs, grumbled John. for I couldn't have bought you a new

John laughed, and so the matter passed

Mabel was judicious, and did not think it necessary to speak to Ben on the subject. She quite understood that the accident was 'done on purpose,' but she did not try to humilate Ben, but rather to keep him on his good behaviour. So she was as friendly and confidential as ever, and Ben preserved his self-respect. He kept his promise, and bought John the village store.

Mabel very soon found herself mistress of the situation. Experience goes for a good deal, but it does not always bring with it the power of managing boys and girls. Mabel had it instinctively. Before ly in her department, a little to the disafor my part' a little more about the girl. pointment of Miss Clarissa Bassett, who Nobody seemes to know anything about felt that the school should have been her.'

Mabel still boarded at the hotel. She was quietly on the look out for a more desirable boarding-place.

One afternoon Mabel walked home with Rose, and introduced herself to Mrs. Kent. She dsesses. found her a delicate, refined woman, such as she imagined Rose woulh grow to be in time. Everything was inexpensive, but there were traces of good taste about the little establishment.

'I am glad to see you, Miss Frost,' said Mrs. Kent, with a quiet cordiality. " have heard of you continually from Rose, who is your enthusiastic admirer.'

'Rose and I are excellent friends,' said Mabel, smiling kindly on the little girl. 'She never gives me any trouble.'

'I have never heard of any complaints from any of her teachers. One thing that I have learned surprises me, Miss Frost. You have wonderfully changed Ben Hadley, who has been the torment of previous teachers.' Mabel smiled.

'I like Ben,' she said. 'From the first I saw that he had many good points. He was merely mischievous.

'Merely,' repeated Mrs. Kent, smiling. Mischief may give a geed deal of trouble, but the spirit that leads to it deceitful. may be turned into anothor channel. This I have done with Ben. the reputation of being a good housekeeper, but withall she was a virago, and her husband a long-suffering victim of domestic tyranny. She was a thin little woman, with a shrewish face, who was seldom known to speak well of anybody : but she provided the best table in North Sparta. 'I don't think I should enjoy boarding with Mrs. Breck,' said Mabel, straighforwardly. 'I should like much better boarding with you.

'You dont know how plainly we live,' said Mrs Kent. I should like very much to have you here, but my table doesn't compare with Mrs. Breck's.'

'Let me make you a buisness proposition, Mrs. Kent,' said Mabel. 'I dont pretend to be indifferent to a good table and I know the small amount annually paid for a teacher's board would not justify you in changing your style in iving.
