CHAPTER V.

MISS CLARISSA BASSETT. The school house in North Sparta was located not far from the centre of the villiage. It was wholly without archiwere severely practical, and were not willing to spend a dollar in the interest of beauty. Their money was the result of hard laboor, and frugality was not to be wondered at. In a trading community architecture receives more attention.

The school-house was two stories height, and contained two schools. The priminary school, for children under eight, was kept in the lower room. The grammar school, for more advanced scholars, which Mabel Frost had undertaken to teach, was kept in the upper

'That lady is your colleague, Miss Frost,' said the Squire. 'My colleague?' repeated Mabel, in tone of enquiry. 'Yes: she keeps the priminary school.

'Yes; she has taught the same school 'Then she isn't a very young lady?'

'Yes, I would,' said Mabel, promptly. 'She don't get but six dollars a weeka dollar less than you.' . I don't care for that.'

'The district wouldn't be satisfied, said the Squire, in a decided tone, to whom Mabel was an enigma. 'They wouldn't be willing to have Clarissa teach the older pupi's.' By this time they had reached the entry, and awaited the arrival of Squire Settlement, in the Parish of Canterbury, to the Trustees of Schools for District No. 8, in Office of York County; together with the a thin face and a prim expression which stamped her as an old maid, though all many ladies, who were dangerously near forty, who were far from prim, but rather plump embodiments of smiling jollity. This was not the case with Clarissa Bassett. She was in the market; but it had been her lot to see the companions of her early days sail off, one after another, on the matrimonial sea, and she had been neglected on the shore, She had even seen some of her own pupils-young chits-marry, while their teacher with all her experience of life was unappropriated. It was a trial, and they who laugh lightly at the disappointments of those who, from force of circumstances, ars unwedded, do not appreciate how great it somtimes is.

'Miss Frost,' said Squire Hadley, with a wave of his hand towards Clarissa, 'let me make you acquainted with Miss Bassett, who has kedt our primary school for fifteen years with acceptance and sucout, if disatisfied with their assessment will be required to appeal to the Assessor by petition, in strict accordance to instructions on the back benefactor, Miss Bassett, said Mabel cordially.

'I was very young when I commenced teaching,' said Miss Basset, rather uneasy at the allusion to her term of service. 'I am a beginner,' said Mabel. 'I shall be glad to have an experienced teacher so near me, to whom I can refer in case of difficulty.

Miss Bassett, who had been prejudiced against Mabel, because she, so much younger was glaced over her head, was flattered by this acknowledgment of inferiority.

'I shall be very glad to give you any help in my power, Miss Frost,' she said. 'You will excuse me now; I must go and look after my young pupils.

Miss Frost followed Squire Hadley upstairs, and into the school-room. The school-room itself was an average

They were further defaced in many instances by ink-spots. Mabel's neatness was rather offended by these things which she took in in her first general survey. It had been different in the school-room for both sexes.

'I see most of the scholsrs are here.' said Squire Hadley.

Mabel looked around the room.

Between forty and fifty scholars varying in age from eight to sixteen, were seated at the desks. They had taken seats previously selected,upon her entrance. For the most part she liked their looks. Several looked mischevious. but even they were bright eyed and good natured. All eyes were fixed upon her.
