PUBLIC OPINION.

There is nothing more tiresome than the platitudes in which popular orators and journals indulge when, generally for some sinister purpose, they set themselves to extol the wisdom and virtue of "the people." People who have any sense know just how wise and virtuous they are, and quite fail to see the point of the excessive adulation thus bestowed on them. It is difficult indeed to imagine what class of persons it is that can be gratified by praise of so inordinate and conventional a kind. Why should a lot of people who have chosen representatives of a certain kind care to be told that they are so very much wiser than the men they have chosen? Yet that is the common refrain; the people are so much wiser and better than the politicians, why don't they show their wisdom and goodness by bringing better men to the front? The men who are elected to-day may in a short time return to private life and become electors themselves; do they thereupon acquire a sudden increase in wisdom, and do they show their increased wisdom by helping at the first opportunity to elect wiser men than themselves? That seems to be the way it is understood to work; the whole thing is fulsome and absurd to the last degree.

The reason why politicians are encouraged to proceed every now and then to some unusual length in defiance of political principle is that, in general, they can reckon on the partisanship of their followers to support whatever they may propose. What the public have to do, therefore, when by a tardy or fitful exercise of political conscience they have escaped some disgrace, is not so much to congratulate themselves on a remarkable achievement, as to wonder, with some little humiliation, why the achievement was necessary—why their political leaders ever came to propose to them anything so disgraceful. It is rare that a man is approached with a disgraceful proposition unless he has in some way created the impression that the proposition might be well received; and, therefore, mixed with any lofty indignation with which he repels it, should be some heart searching as to how the whole thing came about. It is, of course, satisfactory to think that there are bounds which cannot be passed—that there is a point at which the better sense of the community rebels—but it is impossible not to think at the same time that this better sense might be kept in more regular exercise. Instead of descending like a "deus ex machina" into the political arena on critical occasions to safeguard the State against some signal danger, why should it not be the daily providence and bulwark of the State? The modern State depends for its prosperity and security on the faithful performance by citizens of their political duties; and it therefore behooves every citizen to inform himself as to the issues of the day, to consider carefully which side he should take, looking to the greatest interest of the country, and to vote and otherwise shape his course accordingly. If this were done as a rule by all voters capable of forming an intelligent and honest judgment, there would be very little encouragement given to dishonest political machinations; and those elements in the country that count on political corruption in one form or another for liberty to pursue fraudulent and immoral ends, would find their action so circumscribed that all the profits of their several nefarious trades would be gone.

There is reason to hope, we are very glad to say, that the sounder elements in the community are becoming more conscious of their strength and more disposed to use it for the purification of politics. Not one recent election only, but many, have turned more or less on moral issues, and have turned in the right direction. Let there be no pause in the good work; above all, let there be no reaction. The effect upon the administration of the government in any country of a decided expression of public opinion in favor of what is right, rather than of what is expedient in a party sense, cannot but be worthy of consideration. Neither the intelligence nor the zeal of public employes in general comes up to the standard that might be realized if our politics were dominated by higher principles; and not only is a vast burden thus laid on the industry of the country, but many advantages which might be secured to the public are lost.—W. J. Youmans, in Popular Science Monthly (U. S.)

Earthquakes.

A recent dispatch from Rome says:—Severe shocks of earthquake were experienced at Venice and Verona. Many buildings were damaged and several persons injured but no one killed. Violent shocks were also experienced at Bologna, Ferrara and Treviso, in each of which towns great damage was done to buildings. In Treviso the entire audience rushed from a theatre into the street at the first shock. Many were hurt in the panic, but only one was killed. Shocks have been generally throughout the north of Italy. Persons coming from Laibach give vivid descriptions of the scenes of terror during the earthquakes. The first shock was so severe that the whole populace was aroused, and hundreds ran, half-naked, into the streets. The streets were blocked with carts and carriages, in which the sick and aged and children were being conveyed to places of safety. A little later vans loaded with furniture could be seen on every side. Men and women, carrying clothing and boxes of valuables, crowded the streets, and often stopped the progress of the vehicles. Terrified groups knelt on the corners and before churches praying for deliverance and begging the priests to pray for them. The barracks, the museum and distillery and half a dozen other large buildings were laid in ruins. Scores of other buildings were cracked and half shaken from their foundations. At Fiume the audience in the Players' Theatre had just risen to leave the building when the first shock came. All crowded madly to the exits. Many persons were injured in the struggle, but none fatally. All night boats, filled with fugitives, put out from the Fiume wharves to the shipping. There is hardly a vessel in the harbor without several Fiume families on board, who refuse to return to land. During the panic in Trieste a frightened horse ran down a crowded street, injuring twenty persons and knocking down 50 or 60. The harbor was agitated as if by a storm, and several boats carrying persons to the shipping were capsized. Six persons were drowned. Slight shocks have been felt here.

Shocks of earthquake were experienced throughout southern Austria. At Laibach, 353 miles northeast of Trieste, 31 shocks were felt. All of the churches, public buildings, business houses and residences in the town were damaged. Several persons were killed by falling walls, etc., and a large number were more or less seriously injured. At Velden ten shocks were felt and at Trieste four. Shocks were also felt at Abbazia, Arco, Gorizia, Cilli and other places, in all of which many buildings were destroyed. The direction of the disturbance was from southeast to northwest. Slight seismic vibrations were also felt in this city. Communication between Trieste and Laibach is suspended. In many of the districts between the two towns, as well as in the sections visited by the shocks, the people are camping out in the fields. At the first shock in Venice the guests fled from the hotels to the public squares, and the inhabitants deserted their homes and took refuge in the available open spaces. Many of the guests with a large number of the residents, left the city by early trains fearing a recurrence of the shocks.

All the clocks in the city stopped at 11.20 o'clock. Persons arriving at the railroad stations report deaths and damage to property in many towns beside those already mentioned. They say that along the railroad lines they saw thousands camping in the fields. The trains were rocked by the shocks. Some say that the rolling motion was as noticeable as on a ship at sea. All reports indicate that shocks followed the lines from Florence to Botzen, Florence to Vienna, and Serajeno, in Bosnia, to Stein-am-Angar in Hungary.
