Good Roads.

With the near approach of another crop-handling season and the heavy movement of tonnage incident to the large prospective yield, comes anew the subject of good roads as an auxiliary to a more equal distribution of crop movement throughout the year. Under present conditions producers and carriers alike suffer from the congestion which is necessitated at certain seasons of the year by the demands of farm work on the one hand and impassable roads on the other. Farmers perhaps more than any other industrial class, have their hours of labor regulated by the weather. During rains or immediately thereafter—providing the rains be long continued—it is practically impossible for them to work. The fields are in no condition for cultivation and the roads are, in a majority of cases, impassable, so that in the course of a year the farmer is subjected to many hours of enforced idleness. The common carrier also is similarly affected, principally, however, as a result of the effect of the wet weather on the farmer rather than upon himself. During the period of dry weather, when crop weather is not imperative and roads are good, agricultural products are rushed to the initial markets with the utmost dispatch, filling the warehouses and creating a demand for cars that cannot readily be supplied, if at all. It is no uncommon sight to see at many of the western points, numerous wagon loads of grain standing all day and oftentimes all night, because of the lack of transportation facilities to carry off the accumulation with which the various warehouses are already filled. Indeed, instances have been known where wagons have been thus obliged to wait three and four days before they could be unloaded.

The remedy for much of this congestion is to be found in the construction of good roads of such a character as not to be easily affected by the weather. Some railroad companies, appreciating the value of such construction, have offered to haul the necessary material from the quarries or other source of supply, to the various distributing points at extremely low rates, and in some cases without charge. It is probable that the adoption of a rule of free carriage within reasonable limits by all roads, would prove a profitable undertaking. The advantages of a regularly distributed delivery throughout the year would largely offset the extra expense incurred by such a regulation. If to the free transportation of material could be added the employment of criminals upon the roads, instead of using them in competition with the artisans outside of our penitentiaries, an additional benefit would result. It is, of course admitted that the adoption of this plan would increase the expenses of the maintenance of the various institutions of correction and punishment through the United States, but that would cheerfully be met by the property owners, in view of the larger advantage growing out of road improvement. It would also do away with the competition between criminal and other labor, a competition that is now in some quarters severely felt and bitterly assailed.

This question is one which should be generally taken up by the local papers of each community. It is believed that railway managers are sufficiently advised of the advantages of such a movement to willingly co-operate with the local authorities wherever a well directed effort is made. The work will necessarily make slow progress and it cannot therefore be too early commenced.—

Our Faults in Others.

Many people have a genius for seeing the faults in others, but there is one peculiarity about this faculty which will be an interesting study for the psychologist; it is the tendency to criticize most sharply those faults in others which are most prominent in ourselves. In other words, that which excites our greatest antagonism is the duplication of our own traits. It would be amusing, if it were not disturbing and pathetic, to hear people criticize mercilessly traits in others which everybody recognizes as being the special possession of the critics themselves. It is pathetic because it shows how little we know about ourselves, and it is disturbing because it suggests to the listener that he may be doing precisely the same thing. In all probability he is. So little do we know ourselves, as a rule, that when we see parts of ourselves in others we detest them. If we recognized them as being in a sense our own possessions, we might not like them any better, but we should surely sympathize with their possessors. If there is any common experience which ought to draw us together, it is identity of struggle and temptation. We ought to stand shoulder to shoulder with those who are fighting the same fight which we are fighting, and who find in themselves the same tendencies to evil or to weakness; and yet these are the very people from whom, as a rule, we withdraw most entirely, and upon whose shoulders the lash of our criticism falls most mercilessly. It is a good plan, when one finds that he is specially irritated by certain traits in another, to study himself closely in order to discover whether those very traits are not his own characteristics. It generally happens that a trait which is specially irritating in another is the very trait which everybody finds in us.—The Outlook.

An Honest Man.

Ambassador Bayard is not a joker, but there are occasions when he indulges in a quiet bit of fun. On his last trip home, a dozen newspaper men boarded the steamship at quarantine to interview him. As he was known to be rather averse to the pumping process, the reporters concluded to delegate one of their number to do the interviewing. The delegate selected, who bore the name of Jones, called one of the junior assistant stewards, a ruddy-cheeked English boy, handed him his card, with the request to take it to Mr. Bayard, at the same time dropping a quarter in his hand as a tip. The lad hurried away, and in a few minutes returned with the card and the money, with these words: "Mr. Bayard sends his compliments, and desires to state that while he has the honor of the acquaintance of many Joneses he does not remember any Mr. Jones who owes him 25 cents." "What!" cried the reporters, in chorus—"what have you done?" "I gave Mr. Bayard the card and the quarter, as you told me to do," whimpered the boy. The interview was postponed until the next day.

The Bicycle in France.

Our Paris correspondent writes: M. Zola has taken to cycling. M. Jules Claretie followed his example, and M. Rochefort now enjoys every morning a spin round the Bois. The number of French women who cycle rapidly increases. The wide streets are alive with them from dusk to midnight, the weather then being cool. Elderly ladies avail themselves of the steel horse in the evenings and early mornings. One sees husbands and wives on tandems. I know a retired officer who is nearly seventy-five who goes out on a tandem cycle with a wife over sixty. She says that his cycle did his health so much good that he is now able to give up his matutinal and evening absinthes. He and madame went on their tandem last winter from Toulouse to Nice.

A Deceiving Bottle.

Sir Wilfrid Lawson says that he never received a knock-down till, spying a laborer walking along with the old, familiar black bottle protruding from his pocket, he entered into conversation with him, and pointed out the misery which had resulted from the bottle, and earnestly exhorted the man to flee from its contents. The man was so overcome that he took out the receptacle and emptied the liquor into the road. Sir Wilfrid's face beamed with pleasure, and, handing the man sixpence, he said: "Take that; it will buy you something better." The man, to the disgust of Sir Wilfrid, entered a public house and spent the sixpence in beer. The liquor he had thrown away was cold tea.

The Yellow Jacket.

The "yellow jacket," about which so much has been heard of late, is rather a vest than a jacket. It is made of rich yellow satin, has no sleeves, fits the wearer closely, and reaches to the thighs. It is fastened on the side with small buttons, and has embroidered on the bosom the royal dragon of China. There are but half a dozen men in the empire who are entitled to wear it.
