THREE ADMIRALS.

About Sampson, Cervera And Camara.

The following articles about the opposing admirals are written, as one may see with a strong American bias:—"Admiral Sampson has been conspicuous among the men who have given us our new navy; and his service in this connection has been such, as a member of various boards, and as chief of the bureau of ordinance, that he has become familiar with the minutest details of construction, armor, guns and engines. It is no exaggeration to say that he could personally make any naval gun, or repair any engine or electrical device found on his ships, says a writer in the Independent. His mind goes always to first principles—a cool, analytical mind, that wastes no time over unessentials. His great range of information comes rather from sheer force of intellectual endowment than from any laborious process of acquirement, for he has never been known as a student in the commonly accepted sense of that word. His breadth of mind was admirably, and to naval minds most strikingly, shown when more thoroughly to familiarize himself with an important branch of his profession, he applied for service in the bureau of ordinance under Commodore Folger, who was much his junior in rank, and had served as first lieutenant of the Swatara under his command.

Admiral Sampson is a man of striking personal appearance, of fine, clear cut features, slender, above the medium height, slow and deliberate both in movement and speech, not given to many words. He is too much absorbed in his profession, and the mental processes which give him his seeming intuitive knowledge of its manifold complexities to be what is called sociable; but he is always just and considerate to his subordinates and watchful over the welfare of his crews.

A man of reserve, of perfect self-possession, at all times and under all circumstances, he would approach such a problem as the annihilation of the Spanish fleet with the same coolness and deliberation that he would an armor trial or the designing of a new gun; no detail would be too small to be overlooked, no possible contingency would be unprovided for.

There is only one opinion about Sampson in the navy, and that is that he is the right man in the right place, and that he has not already paralleled Dewey's achievement in Manila is not because he is not ready and able and anxious to do so. When his time comes he will not be found wanting."

It will be seen from the above that Sampson is faultless. "Cervera is a nephew of Admiral Torpete, one of the old-time admirals of the Spanish navy, and probably in his time the best know naval man in Spain, for his fame extended beyond the borders of his own country. He was the leader of the revolt in Jerez, Spain, in 1858, which took place at the height of his career. His mantle fell upon the present Spanish admiral.

Cervera is now 65 years old. He was born in the province of Jerez. His father was a man of large wealth, and owned several estates in the province, and was known as one of the richest wine merchants of Spain. His mother was Marie Torpete, a daughter of Count Torpete y Valle of the royal family of Spain.

They belonged to the aristocracy, and their son was afforded all of the advantages which wealth and position could secure for him. He was graduated from the naval academy of San Fernando, Spain, and after his graduation, in 1851, he was attached to several different training ships, and further prepared for naval warfare. He experienced his first campaign in 1859, in the Spanish expedition which was sent to Morocco, and for his services was successively promoted from ensign to first lieutenant.

He was next sent with an expedition in 1862 to Cochiu China. Spain then had a better standing among the nations of the world than she has today, and it was counted more of an honor to be a lieutenant in her navy. Cervera was next promoted to the rank of captain, and was placed in command of a vessel and sent out to Peru, where war was in progress. This was in 1868, and he remained there until two years later, when the 10 years' war broke out in Cuba, and Spain found it necessary to recall her fleet from the coast of Peru to engage in blockading the ports of Cuba, and in patrolling the coast to prevent the landing of filibustering expeditions, which were carrying supplies to the Cubans during the struggle.

Cervera was recalled from Cuba later, and made secretary of war in the Spanish cabinet. When he retired from that position, he was given the command of the Pelayo, the first and only first-class battleship Spain ever built. It construction was undertaken and carried on under the direction of Admiral Cervera, who was raised to the rank 10 years ago. All of his promotions have come to him because of his family position, and the fact that he is of royal blood, rather than by any service which he ever performed for Spain, although his ability and long experience in the navy are not to be doubted.

Cervera has been aide-de camp to the Queen Regent, and several years ago was at the head of the Spanish naval commission sent to London to confer upon naval matters with like commissioners from other powers. He holds 15 medals which have been bestowed upon him by the Spanish government, and Spain counts him as not only her foremost naval commander, but one of her leaders at all times, and particularly in the war with the United States.

Admiral Manuel de la Camara y Livermore, commander of the fleet now at Cadiz, is 60 years old, and is also a graduate of the naval college at San Fernando. He entered the academy in 1851, at the time Cervera was leaving, and graduated four years later. He is the son of a marine captain, who, in one of his voyages to Liverpool, met and married an English woman named Livermore. He was sent on the expedition to Morocco and served on nearly all of the ships of the Spanish navy. Entering as a cadet, he received promotion by merit rather than by favors. He was made a first lieutenant and a captain in 1871. Camara is a man of very religious habits and melancholy disposition. While in service he is high spirited, in private life he is sad, and is not fond of society. He is said to be a great biblical student, and on shipboard is wont to read passages from the scriptures to his sailors, and has a habit when on shore of visiting and remaining for hours in the cemeteries, and carrying a mournful and sad countenance. In his political affiliations, Camara is like Cervera, a devout Monarchist, and was one of those who advocated bestowing the crown upon Alphonso XII. He was made admiral because of his strict adherence to the King. Consequently, he is greatly favored by the present dynasty, and could have been made minister of marine when the new cabinet was organized, if he had expressed the desire to accept the position. Sagasta tendered him the office, but Admiral Camara refused, preferring to remain in the more active service, in view of the fact that Spain was engaged in war with the United States.

Linseed and Turpentine are not only popular remedies, but are the best known to medical science for the treatment of the nervous membranes of respiratory organs. Dr. Chase compounded this valuable Syrup so as to take away the unpleasant taste of turpentine and linseed.

Mothers will find the medicine invaluable for children it is so pleasant to take and will positively cure Whooping Cough and chest trouble.

A Railwayman's Story.

Mr. W. Franks, in charge of the Grand Trunk Engine Shops, Port Dover, Ont., says: "Four boxes of Doan's Kidney Pills cured me of a very bad attack of Kidney Complaint and Lame Back."

Funny, Perhaps!

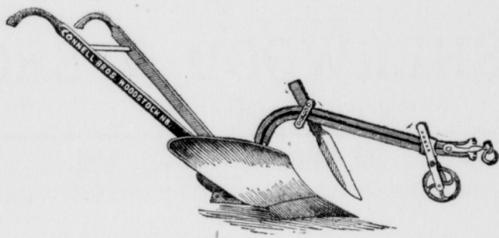

It appears that they had a great patriotic concert in Houlton, and among the recitations by children was this parody on a time worn child's prayer, that deserves, surely, more reverent handling:—

"Now I lay me down to sleep
I pray the Lord my soul to keep
If Uncle Sam don't lick Spain
I'll never say my prayers again.
Amen. Remember the Maine."

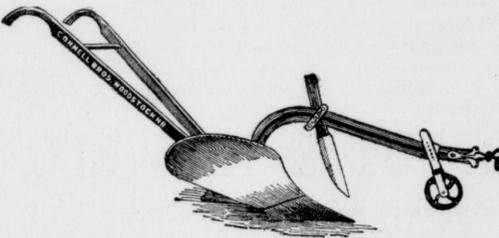

There is a short word in a very old and generally venerated book. It reads "God is not mocked."
