Mrs. Gladstone's Charity.

A poor old woman at Hawarden, living alone in her tiny cottage, has more than once poured out her heart to me as to the hard times in the past when all her children were young and her husband "laid up" with rheumatism. These cottagers were proud with the fine pride—more often found in the north than in the south—that refuses to make its wants known so long as a crust remains in the cupboard, and no one in Hawarden was allowed to know how starved and how cold that mother and her children were, day after day, through that grim winter.

No neighbor dared offer her help, knowing it would be refused. But Mrs. Gladstone heard of it at church one Sunday morning. Instead of going home, she went straightway into the cottage, where the wolf had penetrated further than the door. In the small kitchen the mother and her nine starvelings sat round a Sunday dinner of a small potato pie. "I have come to see how the patient is," the beautiful visitor explained, and said not a word about her real errand. Up the dark steps she went, sat by the poor man's side for a few minutes, and then came down again where, respectfully, the hollow-cheeked youngsters were waiting to begin their meal after the lady from the castle had left. "But mayn't I have a little of that pie with you?" Mrs. Gladstone asked. "It smells so good, and I had breakfast very early." In a few minutes everybody felt at ease, and guest and hostess and hungry bairns alike were cheerily dining together.

An hour later a roasted joint and a large hamper of food was quietly left at the cottage door, with a note from Mrs. Gladstone, saying that as she had made her lunch at the cottage it was only fair that now the cottagers should give her the pleasure of sharing her home lunch also. And next morning work was found for the older children, and the mother was asked to do some sewing, and the patient in the small attic ate strengthening invalid-food henceforth, and never a word was said about it when Mrs. Gladstone came and sat by the little kitchen fire and chatted "as if she was one of us," and no more of gnawing hunger and limbs too thinly clad shivering by the cold hearth. And as in this case so it was in unnumbered ones, all through Mrs. Gladstone's beautiful life. Here and there an instance may come to light, as did the above by a mere chance, from an overflowing heart.—Primitive Catholic.

Gas on the Stomach.

result of imperfect digestion pressing up against the heart, it excites alarming symptoms. Instant relief is afforded by taking half an hour after the meal, ten drops of Perry's Nerville in a little sweetened water. Nerville aids digestion, expels the gas and imparts a sense of comfort. Nerville is good for lots of other things, and wise people keep a 25c. bottle in the house for rheumatism, cramps, neuralgia, toothache &c. Try it.

MEN WHO LIVE BY A SINGLE LINE.

The Caprices of Literary Fame.

It is one of the many odd experiences of life that, while some men in pursuit of fame write a library of books and die and are forgotten, other men under some happy inspiration write a single line, poem, or volume, and are for ever ranked with the immortals.

In some cases immortality goes a-begging from the modest shrinking of an author to claim his offspring, as in the case of the oracle who penned the eloquent words "Don't" in answer to 'Punch's' request for advice to those about to marry; but there are many cases in which men are known by the work of a few minutes or hours whom all the rest of their life's work would have left in obscurity.

Very few read Coleridge nowadays, and fewer still could quote half-a-dozen lines from any of his poems and dramas; and yet to many who have never even heard his name there are few lines more familiar than the oft quoted and misquoted: "Music hath charms to soothe the savage breast."

Charles Wolfe, the Irish divine and poet, wrote many poems of excellence, but only one redeems him and all his work from obscurity, the poem which Lord Byron himself described as "the most perfect ode in the language," and of this few could get beyond the first line: "We buried him darkly at dead of night."

Thomas Gray, poet and friend of Horace Walpole, has left one legacy only from all his writings, but that is an imperishable one—his "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard," the most widely-quoted poem in our language. Yet those who can recite every word of it, with the infallibility of a phonograph, could probably not even give the name of a single other poem by the same writer.

Lady Anne Barnard would have no place at all in the public memory if she had not written that sweet and pathetic ballad, "Auld Robin Gray," which has brought sympathetic tears to the eyes of thousands who have not read another line by its author.

John Pomfret, the Bedfordshire poet, would have been forgotten for nearly two centuries had he not in a happy hour penned his exquisite poem, "The Choice," which is considered by many, including Southey and Johnson, the most perfect and beautiful in our language.

Of the two English poets of the name of Collins one is only known to have attempted a single poem, but that has been sufficient to make him immortal among lovers of beautiful verse. Nothing is known of the life of the author of "Tomorrow," but his poem has given delight to thousands who could not give his Christian name or birthplace "to save their lives."

"Single-speech Hamilton" won oratorical fame by the very simple expedient of never speaking in the British Parliament except on one occasion; although he was a man of political importance, Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland for over twenty years, and actually author of a volume of speeches. His works and writings are as dead as their author, but the memory of that single impressive speech serves to keep his memory more alive than that of many an orator famous in his lifetime.

There are many men whose memory will be green for centuries as the consequence of having produced one successful book. Cervantes has a popularity almost as widespread as that of Shakespeare; and yet all his plays are lost, and of all his writings practically nothing remains but "Don Quixote," a book which is regarded as a classic in almost every country of Europe.

Boswell will live as long as the memory of Johnson endures, solely through his life of his great friend. In the same way Scott confers immortality on his son-in-law and biographer, Lockhart; for, apart from this single valuable contribution to our knowledge of the great magician, Lockhart and all his writings would be forgotten by all but the student.

Goldsmith lives immortally in his "Vicar of Wakefield," and practically in nothing else; and Oliver Schreiner would scarcely be known today outside the circle of her friends if she had not, as a girl, written "The Story of an African Farm" and "found herself famous."

EVERY HOME NEEDS a remedy that is adapted for use in case of sudden accident or illness. Such a one is Pain-Killer. Avoid substitutes, there's but one Pain-Killer, Perry Davis'. 25c. and 50c.

You and I write our lives as if on one of those manifold writers which you use. A thin, filmy sheet here, a bit of black paper below it, but the writing goes through on the next page; and when the blackness that divides two worlds is swept away there, the history of each life written by ourselves remains legible in eternity. And the question: What sort of an autobiography are we writing for the revelation of that day, and how far do our circumstances help us to transcribe fair in our lives the will of God and the image of our Redeemer?—McLaren.
