Cheap Men Not Wanted.

"Cheap men not wanted" is to be the motto of one of the new sky-scraping hotels which will be opened shortly in upper Fifth avenue, New York, not far from the entrance to Central Park. Everything about the hotel is to be the finest money can buy, and the type of New Yorker who likes to get cheap food in fine settings is not desired. A unique and simple way of discouraging him has been devised. There will be no prices on the menu cards. A plain omelette may cost as much as a brace of quail, or a wedge of pie—if they condescend to serve anything so plebeian—may be as expensive as a "baked Alaska," so far as the guest can tell from the menu. When one has eaten all one wants the waiter will bring an itemized check with a glorious footing in red ink. "We want the patronage of people who order what they want regardless of cost," said one of the managers of the new hotel; "there are thousands of New Yorkers who like to be seen in an expensive place. They search the menu through for inexpensive dishes, and then order half portions. We will not have room for them." "But a man experienced with high-class menu can spot the cheaper dishes from memory," objected a friend. "We will have some surprises for him spread through the bill. Dishes that are ordinarily moderately priced will be top-liners with us." "The new hotel for mine," cried a youth who had just heard of the plan; "I go around a bit with the prettiest girl in New York. She believes she has an expensive appetite, and scales the menu every time for the most expensive dishes. She'll be lost with a priceless dinner card, and I won't think I'm paying for a family of nine every time I sign our supper check.

The Actornine.

Persons who appear on the stage, and act, perform, posture, wriggle, dance, and contort, for the pleasure, edification and exasperation of the audience, may be classified and differentiated as players, actors, artists, yaps, and actornines, according to the size of their heads, the area of their mouths, the strength of their lungs, the perfection of their shape, and the brilliancy of their brass. They are of all sexes, conditions and degrees, except the actornine. She is a lady, and indifferent to the dissemination of that fact. She makes her own conditions, and has many degrees of latitude. Her clothes are riotously audible; her hats corgest the channels of civic navigation; her hair can only be viewed with blue glasses, except in the dark of the moon; and if her intimates are veracious, she has the digestive capacity and equipment of the camel, and a thirst for dry wines, fabricated east of Suez.

Her cloths are made to be worn on the street, not the stage; when she appears on the boards she is emulous to screen few of her charms.

The actornine is not afraid of publicity; she believes that histrionically one press agent is worth two Shakespeares; she loses her diamonds frequently, and her opportunities never, and she is thrown from autos constantly, before gossiping witnesses, who betray her to the press. She is married and divorced twice a month; elopes once a week with Yale and Harvard freshmen; is pursued day and night by noblemen anxious to kidnap her, and she has many tender affairs with emperors and prize fighters.

Having the gift of conversation, united with an inability to sing, her genius runs to comic opera, where fundamentals, not accidentals, count; she is always educated in a convent and intended for grand opera; frequently she has just inherited an enormous fortune from a heart-broken mining millionaire who has loved and lost her, and playwrights, poets and composers are nady competing to write the success of the age for her. She has a profound and technical knowledge of soaps, pianos, salves, breakfast foods, corn cures, and blood purifiers, which she commends over her signature and under her portrait; and she claims to have been cured of spasms by Dr. Wigwag's Winnebago Wart Wash.

In August, she is coyly uncertain whether she will star under Burlesco, Krowman, or Salvage, but by the time the frost begins to nip, and the landlady is suggesting a settlement, the gay and lovely actornine has consented to be one of eight ladies, who figure on the bills as forty, who will revel in one-night stands in the Oil Circuits as the Beautiful Barcelona Blondes, under Ike Nickelstein's management.—Joseph Smith.

WOODSTOCK, N. B., JUNE 22, 1904.

A "Real Good" Man.

Once there was a man whose chin always seemed to be trying to shrink back out of sight. He was weakened and watery-eyed, and when he spoke the sound of his voice seemed to scare him. His income was $53 a month. It had been the same ever since he had stopped eating at his father's table. In the great establishment of the firm that employed him he sat at the desk to which he had been assigned in the beginning. His employers never thought of promoting him, because his one ambition seemed to be to get his work out of the way as soon as possible so that he might go home. He never tried to learn any part of the business aside from that which he had to master in the start. If he had done so it would have kept him away from his wife. He never wasted a moment outside of office hours in trying to help the firm's business. It appeared to be immaterial to him whether the people who employed him prospered or not so long as they were able to pay him his $53 a month regularly.

But hold on! Wait a while! His wife, who was a large, red-faced person with a three-story chin and a nose that was not visible except from in front, boasted that in all the twenty-seven years which they had been married Henry had never remained downtown a single night, leaving her to worry about him. He never drank anything stronger than ginger ale, and he never used tobacco in any form. But he had another virtue which was greater than any of those. He never went away in the morning without kissing her, and he still called her Pet.

If he had been a Napoleon of industry he would probably have had to stay out late at night sometimes; he would have been unable to get along on the allowance of 60 cents a week which his wife gave him, because one cannot be popular without spending money now and then, and he wouldn't have been able to go through life without learning to smoke or without at least taking an occasional glass of charged water. Moreover, it isn't likely that he would have kissed his wife every morning for twenty seven years, because, having many things on his mind, he would undoubtedly have forgotten it once in a while.

Moral—If a "real good" man's wife is satisfied to have him that way why should he take the trouble to get out and do things?

The latest story of the Kaiser's self-absorption ought to amuse him. The conversation had turned upon the cares of monarchs, and somebody put in the inevitable quotation, "As the immortal William says, 'Uneasy is the head that wears a crown.'" "Dear me," remarked the Kaiser, "I don't remember of ever saying that."

In the Window,

We expect to resume our business of slaughtering lambs this season as usual. We buy our lambs by the pound, weighing when taken away, which has proved very satisfactory.

We shall continue to pay one cent per pound more for ewes and wethers than we do for buck lambs.

We advise weighing all lambs before selling by the head, to see if we are not offering more by the pound for good lambs than they will bring by the head.
