Two Injuries.

Perhaps the man who maltreats a book, even by accident, deserves to pay for it twice over, and logically he may sometimes be justly called upon to do it. A daily newspaper says that a borrower recently handed in a book at a public lending library, and the attendant thereupon discovered a hole in one of the leaves.

It was necessary to enter a description of the damage in a book kept on the counter. A clerk entered the title and number of the book, and the attendant described the damage thus:

"Page 215: a hole." Then he turned the leaf, and added, "Page 216, another hole."

It is Here

The patronage accorded us by both the physicians and the public is such that it is necessary to carry a very extensive stock of drugs and medicines. You may feel sure, therefore, that no matter what you may need it is to be had here if to be found at all in this locality.

The fact that this is a store "that has it" is proof of several other things that should appeal to careful drug buyers.
