A Druggist's Experience.

Any one who has read the somewhat weird story of "Wireless" in Rudyard Kipling's latest book will be interested in the following recital of a druggist's daily experiences.

The bright and glittering foreground of the average druggist's life has also, it appears its deep and dismal back-ground of daily gloom.

"You haven't any idea," remarked a highly intelligent pharmacist, behind the counter of a handsome little shop, "how many persons, besides myself, try to run this little drug store. All day long and far into the night, the boat. Others from neighboring ice patches charged rapidly on to the scene, and the situation of the boat and its occupants was dangerous in the extreme. The poor Eskimo crouched down in the boat, evidently expecting to be annihilated by the furious animals that surged round. As they came up to the boat, they tried to get their great, powerful tusks over the gunwales, and had one succeeded in doing this, there would have been slight hopes of any one escaping. Had the boat been capsized, no one could possibly have survived, and to keep the angry crowd off was no easy matter.

The white men fired on them, and directly one group disappeared another hastened forward to greet the volley of bullets. There was always the danger of one of the huge creatures rising under the boat and capsizing it; but the occupants had no time to think of this.

The boat was meanwhile gradually approaching the shore, and as the water became more shallow the walrus exhibited less desire to come to close quarters, until, at last, the adventures found that they had beaten off the last of the herd. Several of those which had been shot, however, were floating on the water, and were secured without any interruption from the survivors.

Controlling Public Servants.

One of the fears expressed by those who oppose anything looking towards national ownership of the great public utilities is that a large "official" class of voters would be thereby created who would be able to dictate terms-by their organized influence at elections-to the Legislature or Parliament representing their employes. Well, they have State ownership of railways in Australia, and recently the railway employes there did try to hold up the State in the matter of wages, but they were fought to a finish, and a law was, I believe, introduced to place Australian railway employes in future all in one constituency by themselves, so that they should not be able, by organization, to use their strength in different ridings to turn the scale against one party or the other.

Our neighbors have had a similar experience with the army of men who serve as carriers under the rural mail delivery system. These carriers have a national organization, and the letter carriers in cities have a simthe druggist is at the meroy of all the people | ilar organization. These two bodies combined who come and go and have barrels of advice in the late election, and used their efforts to

"I've lived thirty-three year with Ezry Haines," Mrs. Haines began, in a tone that promised entertainment, "and I never saw him put out or flustrated on any occasion. Fire, floods and famine never stir him a mite. He feels it, mind you, as deep as anybody, for Ezry isn't hard, but you'd never know it. "Have you ever seen him shaken, Mrs. Haines?" the minister asked, interestedly.

"Well, yes," admitted Mrs. Haines, "I've seen him a leetle mite rattled once. That was last month at the county fair, and I said to myself,--for a minute only,-'Ezry isn't the man he used to be.' Then I saw that I was wrong.

"I guess it won't do any harm to tell you about it," Mrs. Haines continued, with friendly inflection. to throw away. We keep postage stamps, purely for accommodation, and many of my customers act as if I ought to be arrested because I happen ever to be out of stamps. I have even had complaints presented because I don't take every identical newspaper print ed in the city, night and morning, for my neighborhood loungers to read. Men tell me what cigars and soap I ought to keep, and what prices I ought to ask; how early I ought to be here; how much time I ought to take at noon, and how late I ought to stay at night. Doctors, as a rule, are the most persistent advisers; every doctor thinks he knows exactly how to run a drug store. Some of the doctors act as if the chemist ought to go home with each prescription customer and sit by his bed while he takes the dose.

"And the thick-headed or careless customer is another long chapter. Last night a big fat man with a croaky voice waddled in here and said: "I can't gargle with this stuff."

"What's the matter?' I asked.

" flt's too thick,' he said, 'no man on earth could gargle with a gargle like this.'

" 'Did you read the directions?'

"The fat man turned the little jar of paste in his hand and read slowly aloud: 'Dissolve one teaspoonful in pint of water, and use as a gargle.

"'Oh,' he croaked, "that's different.' "'Quite different,' I said. Suppose you go home and try again.'

"That's only a sample," concluded the drug man, "but our life is full of diverting encounters, too; we see many interesting and intelligent people, day by day, and they atone for the stupid ones and the meddlers." -Louisville Courier-Journal.

Sport Spiced With Danger.

During Commander Peary's journey into arctic seas with the Kite a boat expedition in search of walrus was organized with an Es kimo as guide. In the book entitled "From Franklin to Nansen" a description of this hunt is given:

They had not proceeded very many miles up Iuglefield Gulf before a light breeze when they saw, on a floating piece of ice, a dozen or so of the animals huddled together, apparently asleep. Sailing gently toward them everyone with a rifle ready, a sudden puff of wind sent the boat ahead quicker and farther than was intended, and it struck the ice. The walrus, never having seen a sailing boat before, looked round at it without paying any more attention than if it had been an. other piece of ice. But the sight of so many valuable creatures within reach of his harpoon was too much for the little Eskimo, and he buried the weapon in the nearest.

At once the attitude of the walrus changed. The wounded member of the herd tried to The wounded member of the herd tried to ecupe, bellowing in its pain, and the rest W. Chase, the famour receipt book author, slid off the ice into the water, and surrounded | are on every box.

defeat members of Congress who had opposed their unjust demands for increased salary. As a punishment and a warning the heads of these two organizations have now been dis missed from the public service. This, as the Springfield Republican says, is a wholesome incident, and it shows, I may add, the tricks. "It was at the county fair, as I just said, and Ezry and I went into one o' those sideshows where a man was doing sleight-o' hand all tricks, mebbe, though when he took a baby' boot out o' old Miss Haskins' pocket that wouldn't have a child within gunshot of her, it did look as though there was something more in it.

"The man took yards and yards of ribbon out of Ezry's pockets, and more handkerchiefs from round his neck than there ever was at one time in the store at the Corners. Ezry never turned a hair. You'd have supposed he grew crops of handkerchiefs under his coat collar regular.

"I guess it kind o' nettled the man to see him take it all as calm as old Tilly, and pretty soon he just put on steam and took three rabbits and a hen out o' Ezry's beard, one after another.

"Folks jest hollered, and for a moment I thought Ezry was going to pieces. But he didn't, as I told you.

"Well, well,' he said, looking at the rabbits and the hen, I've kind o' suspected they was there for some time back.' "
