It appears that a number of smooth gentlemen from a foreign clime are canvassing this county, presumably in the interests of English wholesale houses, for the sale of wooleens, tweeds, linens, etc. They are clad in natty uniforms and have a very fetching way with them. Perhaps these peddlars have obtained licenses; perhaps they have not. If the latter is the case they should be made to obtain them before they palm off another yard of their materials upon the too susceptible citizen, and they should be pushed to the full limit for having neglected to procure them earlier in the game. But, license or no license, it nearly always transpires that hawkers' wares are not only costly but comparatively worthless. It is a most peculiar thing that one half the people in the world would sooner be fooled by a foreigner than satisfied by a local merchant. It is to be hoped that our citizens will in this instance refrain from pursuing a penny-wise pound-foolish policy and will reserve their support for those whose deserving of the same is not open to question.
