If it's the Kidneys, "Sun" Kidney Pills will cure you

A man with weak kidneys is a weak man. The least exertion—the slightest departure from a rigid diet—a cold—aggravates the kidneys and puts the sufferer in a bed of pain.

Newcastle Bridge, N.B., July 29th, 1904.
"I contracted Kidney Trouble about 20 years ago. Since then, when I overexerted myself or got a cold, I would be a constant sufferer from pains in back and hips and soreness across the loins. I was extremely weak, very nervous, and had no appetite. I scarcely got a full night's sleep, and if I tried to work an hour a day, would suffer severe pain. I tried every remedy recommended for Kidney Trouble but none relieved me. At last I was persuaded to use "Sun" Kidney Pills, and bought three boxes. Before I had finished the second box, I slept well, the pains grew less, and now after taking eight boxes, I think I am as well a man as I could reasonably hope to be at my age."

This is no uncommon case, or uncommon cure, with "Sun" Kidney Pills. The excruciating pain—the weakness—the lost vigor and vitality—are all due to kidney trouble. "Sun" Kidney Pills go to the seat of the trouble—make the kidneys well and strong. They relieve the pain—protect these vital organs from taking cold—clear the urine—stop the frequent desire to urinate—enable one to sleep through the night without arising three or four times, as many sufferers from kidney trouble do.

Save yourself from Diabetes and Bright's Disease. Win back health and strength with "Sun" Kidney Pills.

The Czarina.

(Lady Henry Somerset, in New York 'American'.)

Many happy girls in England and America silently envied the woman who was the centre of admiration and adulation in the sunny May of 1896, when Princess Alix of Hesse was crowned Empress of Russia. There has always been a deep interest in this country in the young Czarina, first, because her mother, Princess Alice, was, among all the Queen's daughters, held in the highest esteem, and then because there was a romantic transition from the frugal surroundings of her early life to the subsequent magnificence of the perilous throne which she ascended.

The Czarina has always been attached to England. She was brought up by an English governess and nurse, and she early imbibed English views and customs.

When her first child was born she insisted on fulfilling the duties of a nurse, and, although this was opposed to the Russian royal etiquette, she carried her point. Catherine the Great of Russia tells us in her memoirs, with no little bitterness, how her baby was taken away from her a few hours after its birth, and she was not allowed to see it again for months, but, while in her own case she censured the custom, she followed it by taking her son's wife's baby away, and at once gave it a separate establishment. Early in her married life the Czarina showed her determination to put a stop to smoking among her ladies. Russian women nearly all smoke but the Czarina hinted at reform by requesting that no lady should approach her with the hair, breath or clothing tainted by smoke.

The first influence which dominated her was that of Father John, of Kronstadt and with his help and guidance she placed herself at the head of many of the charitable bodies in the empire, and it was pathetic to know that she sent for all the best known works on the English poor law, in order to study how some betterment among the people could be arrived at. But in considering her task we have to remember that the condition of Russia at this moment resembles that of England before the Magna Charta and the best intentioned and wisest woman in the world would probably fail to work any appreciable change.

On the one hand stands the official of the government, the army, the church the law and the propertied classes, all united to maintain the yoke upon the shoulders of the masses, a bureaucracy corrupt and oppressive; on the other hand, a people ignorant and downtrodden with a history which must appal all who contemplate it, for we have not far to look back to find a hideous record of persecution, both of the Jews and of the Stundists—a million Protestant peasants, of a type resembling the Puritans of the seventeenth century—and all other religious denominations differing from the Orthodox Greek church are oppressed, gagged and betrayed.

Added to the deep shadows thrown by oppression and famine over the vast empire there was the prolonged disappointment when the looked-for son was not vouchsafed. For ten years he had prayed unceasingly for an heir to the Russian throne. A crop of superstitions had grown round the fact that the prayer remained unanswered. The ominous circumstance of the disaster which happened at the Czar's coronation was looked upon as an evil prophecy as to the approaching end of the dynasty. The Czarina was unpopular, and was unable to take her right place at the head of Russian society. But in August last the child so eagerly awaited was born, and men paused in their daily toil to listen to the roar of the cannons, and counted the shots as they announced, from the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, that Russia welcomed an heir.

Then the great bells from the dome of St. Isaac's rang a jubilant peal, and as by magic flags appeared in every street. Decorations were hurriedly fixed to the public buildings, and the people poured out in hundreds to rejoice. The Czar received an ovation when he appeared in public, and flowers were strewn before him and shouts of joy were raised. The churches were filled with thankful worshippers, and the pathetic devotion of the country to its ruler was never more manifest. But with a change in her destiny, there came also a change in the Empress's outlook. I have been told on good authority that since the birth of the boy the Empress has become more Russian than the Russians. When her sister wished her good luck on the birth of the heir, she said, 'He will be a Russian, and a Romanoff,' and it appeared as though the fact that she had become the mother of the heir to the Russian throne outweighed the liberal sentiments which had hitherto characterized her.

It has been truly said that there is one woman living who can perhaps sympathize with the Czarinas at this moment more than any other in the world, the woman who stood at the windows of the Tuilleries, and watched the wild mob surging toward the palace on the last day of the empire. Napoleon had been ruined and defeated, the storm had burst, and the mob surged round the palace where Eugenie stood alone. And then, as the communists poured into the great courtyard, she fled by a back door, never to return. Her heart must turn in sympathy to the woman who stands now on the perilous brink of this great ocean of revolution.

Derelict.

Were ever you busted, foreign, broke as a broken stone. Deep in the heart of Asia, homesick and all alone? If you were, it is you I'd talk to, you who will understand What it means when a fellow meets you, a friend from your native land, Who can talk your native language in the dear old native way, Who will holler, "Gosh dern ye, Henery! What's punkins with to-day? How's all the folks at Wayback? How's old Silas, at the cove? Do the fellers still drop in at night an' set around his stove, An' chew teabacker constant, and spit, an' speckilate About the country's future, very doubtful of its fate? Has Mame Rulon got married yet? How is them Parker twins? I ain't seen none of 'em for years!"—Back where your life begins A voice like this will call you, and visions will arise Too sweet for smiles, too sad for tears, and there before you lies Youth, vanished youth, your hopes, your dreams, all that you might have been; Things it is now too late to do, triumphs too late to win—Stranded, a hopeless derelict, a lump within your throat Rises and chokes your utterance, and, to the kindly note Of friendship in your old friend's voice, of greeting and good-will, All you can stammer in reply is, "Hello, Bill!" S. Decatur Smith, Jr., in March Lippincott's.

Pointed Paragraphs.

Too many people have a habit of going with their bristles up. It is seldom one hears an interesting lie, though the people surely get enough practice. The first question asked in every home by every member of the family returning from an absence on the streets is "Where's mother?" There are two complaints which can usually be made of every woman: She has too much patience with her sons and not enough with their father. Talk about a man fussing about the family bills! You should hear a countrywoman who makes butter talk to her folks when they dip into her cream. It is a good thing to keep at least one building in the course of erection in a small town. It gives the people a place to go and find fault on a Sunday, outside of the regular churchgoing.

Dr. Chase's Ointment

Daily Love Story.

The typewriter girl was asked by the nice young man to marry him. She did not say, "This is so sudden," neither did she fall on his shirt front.

"This is a serious matter for me, George," she said. "I am earning $12 a week now, and that suffices for all my wants. I like you very much, indeed, but if I marry you I will have to give up my situation. The question is, Will I ever regret having given up my situation?"

George was startled, but he saw that the young lady was taking a common sense view of it, and they had a nice confidential talk over the matter. The wedding is at least a year away.—Detroit Evening News.
