Why Dora Remains Single.

It is an unfortunate fact, perhaps, for the sons of great journalists, but it is nevertheless true, that handwriting, whether good or bad, is largely a matter of heredity. In this, as in other matters, like father like son is to a great extent a matter beyond dispute, and like mother like daughter also obtains, generally speaking. By way of explanation, we may mention that Mrs. Masterton's handwriting was execrable.

The case of her daughter Dora was getting desperate. She had been "out" for nearly five seasons, she owned to seven-and-twenty, and her complexion was of the kind which does not by any means wear well. And although she did her level best to be uniformly charming to every one of her male acquaintances, not one of them evinced any desire to remove her from the sheltering security of her mother's wing.

Dora was pensively considering the matter as she sat at her window and surveyed the dismal drizzle which obscured the Park. She was greatly disgusted with the whole of the inferior sex; but hope, we are told, springs eternal in the human breast.

"I believe," she murmured, "that he only wants a little warm encouragement, after all.
I am quite sure he is fond of me; and, after all, if he is insignificant and mean, he's awfully rich, and he's a man, even if only a little one. I must think it well over."

And she was still thinking it over when Mr. Bertie Brading was announced.

"Er—excuse me," said the little visitor, coughing nervously, "it's an unearthly time to call, I know; but you said I might come early, and get that song, you know. It's a desperately pretty thing, you know; and if you'll be good enough to lend it me, it will save me buying."

"Of course!" said Dora. "Sit down, Mr.
Brading. I'll get it for you at once. But I know you'll join me in an early cup of tea."

Bertie had never been known to refuse anything he could get for nothing, from tea to a tin-mine; therefore he sat down, and over the teacups they talked till, as often happened at such times, the conversation bordered on the intimate.

"Do you know, Mr. Brading," said Dora, "I have been thinking about you, and I have come to the conclusion that it is only because you do not know which of your many feminine acquaintances to choose that you haven't done so. Now, am I not right?"

Bertie was uncomfortable, but he nodded.
"Well, I have thought of a plan by which you may make a choice. I am going to write the names of six mutual feminine acquaintances, and place them in a book. You are to choose one slip, and propose tonight. Is that agreed?"

"Perhaps it would be the best way out if it," sniggered Bertie.

For the next two or three minutes Dora scribbled industriously, and in due course Bertie nervously drew a slip from the book.
He looked at it earnestly for a space.

"By Jove!" he said. "I believe you've hit it. Good-day, Miss Masterton!" But when he got outside he whistled. "Phew!" he said, "what an old gag! Of course, her own name was on every slip!"

She met him at a dance a few nights later.
"Oh, Miss Masterton," he said, "I feel I owe my present happiness to you! I did as you told me, and now I'm engaged."

"To whom?" asked Dora, biting her lip.
"I really didn't look at the slip you chose."
"Didn't you? Well, then, it's Nora—Nora Marshall. Oh, I say Miss Masterton, you've broken your fan!"

But British pluck is a difficult thing to overcome, and Dora is now industriously studying to improve her wretched handwriting.

A Lesson In Greed.

There are no new stories under the sun, it is claimed, but this one is worth repeating even if it is old, which, so far as we know, it is not:

A Williamsport travelling man was talking.

"I was riding in the western part of the state a few days ago when I saw a car hog get a deserved lesson. With every other seat in the car occupied, he piled his satchels on the seat ahead of him and remained totally oblivious to many longing glances cast at the seat by passengers who boarded the car at every station. Finally a gentleman came down the aisle and asked the car-hog if the seat filled with satchels was engaged.

"Yes," replied the hog, "the bags belong to a man who has gone into the smoker."

"Well, I'm tired of standing up, and I'll just put these things on the floor and sit here until the man comes back. Then I'll vacate."

"A few miles further on, the car hog came to his station, and, reaching over, began to gather up the parcels, when he was stopped by the other man, who said, "What are you going to do with those?"

"Why, they are mine and there's nothing to hinder me taking them along with me, is there?"

"Certainly there is. You said they belonged to a man who had gone into the smoker. Now they are going to stay there until he comes and claims them."

Then followed a pretty little dispute and the conductor was called. He had but one ruling to make and that was that the bags belonged to a man in the smoker, whoever he was, and they must not be removed. In order to get his property the car hog had to confess that he was a liar and had to prove that the property was his. And he was carried a station beyond the place where he wanted to get off, before the matter was settled. Probably he is not quite so much of a car hog as he was."

Dr. Chase's Ointment

A Sheep-Dog.

During the late Rev. Elijah Kellogg's pastorate in Maine he was persistently opposed by a citizen, of no religious convictions, who took malicious satisfaction in discovering and publishing inconsistencies in the lives of the members of Mr. Kellogg's church. For reasons of his own, which the Boston Herald does not give in printing the story, the citizen decided to remove to another part of the state.

Meeting Mr. Kellogg one day, shortly before his departure, he said:

"Well, I suppose you have heard that I am going to leave town, and I dare say you will be glad of it."

"Glad of it? Why, no," replied Mr. Kellogg. "I shall be very sorry to lose you.
You are so useful to me in my work here I hardly know how I can spare you."

"Spare me?" repeated the citizen, greatly puzzled. "How is that?"

"Why," said the old minister, with a gentle smile, "every time a sheep gets its foot out of my fold you bark from one end of the town to the other. You are the best watchdog I ever knew."

A Christian Brahmin was preaching the gospel in the Deccan, when a Hindoo in the congregation began vehemently to contradict.
In good Oriental fashion the sermon was immediately suspended, and the disputants retired to a garden to settle the point at their leisure. The substance of the debate was this: "You declare God to be infinite," said the Hindoo. "Yes." "What is the meaning of infinite?" "It means limitless."
"And what part of speech is good?" "Good is an adjective." "And what is the grammatical function of an adjective?" "To limit a noun." "How then do you apply an adjective to God, calling Him good, and thus limiting the limitless?"

The Difference Between Expert and Unskilful Tea Blending

THE qualities of different teas prove that there is a distinct difference between expert Red Rose blending methods and the usual methods.

Several kinds of teas may be blended, but if unskilfully selected they will not combine to make a perfect blend; they will retain their original individual characteristics with their roughness and harshness emphasized.

Such tea is bitter, poorly flavored in the cup (and there is much of it in bulk and package form on the market). It emphasizes the result of inexperience, lack of knowledge of combining qualities of different teas, imperfect blending, poor selection, and the hundred and one other causes of poor tea.

But my expert Red Rose blenders select the right grades of strong, rich Indian teas and delicate fragrant Ceylon teas, and produce Red Rose Tea with entirely new characteristics—a tea with that "rich fruity flavor" —a tea so exquisitely different and better than any brand of Ceylon alone, that no one who once tries it ever goes back to Ceylon again.
