

News of Hartland and Vicinity

FRED. H. STEVENS, Reporter, and Manager Hartland Branch Office.

WOODSTOCK, N. B., MARCH 14, 1906.

Westward Ho.

A good portion of the population of Brigh-on and Aberdeen go this week to Daysland, Alberta, to take up farms and make their homes. Those who go are Byron and Wil-mot Ricker, of Knowlesville, who have sold their farms to James Hobbs and Fred Hemp-hill; Perley McKenzie of Carlisle, sold out to Lee Dyer, Osmond Fraser, of South Knowles-ville, sold out to M. M. Murphy, and Leverett McElhiney of Argyle. They chartered a car and sent all their household goods, waggons, machinery, etc., in advance.

All these men are a part of the very back bone of the farming community they come from and the west will benefit by acquiring such men, although the East cannot well spare them.

The point they are bound for is in the genial climate of South Alberta, and West of Calgary.

Charles Dickinson and Fred Beals of Windsor also go to British Columbia at the same time the others leave.

Amy Carson's Life.

The doctor had been having a treat. His college chum, who for twenty years had been doing missionary work in the West, had come East to attend a conference of his church, and stopped over on the way for a few days with his old friend. Together missionary and doctor made the doctor's rounds, and talked over old times between the calls. But the third morning the doctor, coming out of a shabby house, climbed to his seat with a troubled face.

"Is it serious in there?" the missionary asked.

His friend nodded.

"It's been serious all her life," he said gravely. "We country doctors become students of biography whether we will or not, and I am often struck with the frequency with which the secret of a life's success or failure can be found in a single word. I know one woman whose whole life has been a wonderful interpretation of the word honor, and many whose grit would put battle-field heroism to shame. That's a fine word—grit. To my mind it's the indispensable quality for man or woman—even love fails without it. Amy Carson has spoiled two lives, certainly, because she lacked it."

"It began when she was a pretty, spoiled girl who shirked everything unpleasant. We boys used to do her examples for her in school—it was our idea of chivalry then. She married young a promising fellow, who had a chance by a year or two of self-denial to make a good business place for himself. But Amy couldn't stand hard times, so he tried to give her what she wanted while he struggled on in business.

"The result was in an hour of weakness he stole from his employer. He confessed, and went to prison like a man. It was Amy's great chance, and she lost it. He came out, broken in spirit by her reproaches and complaints, and died in a few months. That left Amy with three children, but she never thought of trying to support them. She carried them all to her father. There she sat about and moaned, while her eldest child, a girl of eight, took up the burden. She has carried it ever since, and she's over thirty now, and somehow, by one of the miracles the human heart achieves, she has kept her love for her mother, and is broken-hearted because she is dying—dying for the same reason that she has failed everywhere, because she hasn't grit enough to live. When I think of the burdens that woman has put upon others—"

"There's the daughter," the minister reminded him gently.

"I know," the doctor yielded. Then he drew a long breath. "Think what she might have been to that daughter! Failures are such terrible things!"

The veteran French officer, General de Negrier, has given to the Revue des Deux Mondes his criticisms of the Russo-Japanese campaign.

The chief lesson which the General draws from the eastern battlefields is that the old tactics of Napoleon must return. Victory will be with the army which attacks and attacks again. The trenches with telephone communications, the tangles or barbed wire, the pits with sharp stakes, the electric mines, have all failed to keep off the conquering attacks of desperate and well-fed troops.

The next lesson to be learned is the breaking of many grand old traditions. The galloping trooper who reminds one of the old days of the tournament must go. Cuirassiers and hussars, dragoons and lancers will all be merged in one force of cavalrymen, all in the same uniforms, exchanging busbies and helmets for the wide felt hat of the modern soldier in the field.

The new cavalryman will carry the infantryman's rifle which has already been issued to the English troopers, and he will fight for the most part afoot, using his horse as though it were a mere bicycle to carry him from place to place.

And the infantryman must leave his volley-firing, learn more individuality and keep his bayonet for a last resource.

The March Feeling.

This is the time of year when almost everyone feels dull, languid and out of sorts. The long winters of this country are hard on the strongest people and well nigh unendurable to the weakly ones. Lack of health—giving fresh air and free outdoor exercise, the result of artificial heating and heavy, impermeable clothing causes the bad feelings of March. These are not imaginary illnesses but very often such as lead to serious conditions. The system needs proper care and treatment.
