The housewife who wishes for a variety of jellies, especially where fruit is scarce, other than apples, can make a large quantity of apple jelly and when jellied, put into separate vessels on the fire, and add extracts of orange, pineapple, banana, or lemon, and she will be surprised to find what a delicate, natural flavor each kind has. Some drop in a few sweet geranium leaves, and find it very satisfactory. This saves time, labor and experience with perfectly satisfactory results.

New Chancellor of the University of New Brunswick.

Dr. C. C. Jones will be appointed to the chair of mathematics and the chancellorship of the University of New Brunswick and will enter upon his duties this month.

Dr. Jones after completing a course at the Provincial Normal school taught the superior school at Koswick Ridge for several years. He entered the University of New Brunswick in 1893 and graduated in 1897, taking high honors in mathematics and mathematical physics, and winning the governor general's gold medal. The following year he completed a post graduate course at Harvard and received the degree of B. A. from that institution. In 1899 he took the degree of M. A. in course from the U. N. B. and in 1902, his Alma Mater conferred upon him the degree of Doctor of Philosophy. He has filled the chair of mathematics at Acadia University since 1898. In addition to being chancellor of the university Dr. Jones becomes chairman of the faculty, a member of the board of education and a member of the University Senate. The Rev. J. H. McDonald says: "Prof Jones has made a great name for himself at Acadia. He is regarded as a superb teacher and disciplinarian, and has since the retirement of Dr. Trotter been registrar of the university, which involves much of the executive and administrative care of the institution. In addition to his work at Harvard, he was two or three years ago granted a year's leave of absence which he spent at the University of Chicago, pursuing special studies. Previous to that he was offered the chair of mathematics in Colby University, Waterville, Me, but owing to the transition through which Acadia was then passing he was induced by President Trotter to decline the appointment. Prof. Jones is not only an ideal college man, but is a man of affairs as well. He is a strong moral force in the community life and has developed to a good degree the gift of public address. He represented Acadia at the educational meeting of the Baptist convention held last week in Liverpool, N. S. and made a fine impression. Dr. Jones is a native of Westmoreland County and married Miss Baird, sister of Rev. Frank Baird, of Sussex, N. B. His name has been mentioned also in connection with the presidency of Acadia, but that office has always been held by a clergyman and it is said there is a disposition on the part of governing board not to break the line of succession.

A Rockefeller Trick.

The story of Edgar Brown the discoverer of the great Mesaba and Vermillion iron ranges, the richest and most productive in the world, is a pitiful tale of a stalwart optimist who struggled upward against heavy odds only to suffer defeat when success seemed to be within his grasp. Brown died last week penniless in a pauper's bed, in a Sault Ste Marie hospital. A few years ago he and his partner, Merritt, owned the two ranges which were even then, in the early days of their development valued at $13,000,000. To tell how the owners lost their control is but to repeat another chapter in the long story in which John D. Rockefeller is always the dominant factor. Brown was a Pennsylvanian born, and served with bravery as an officer in a keystone regiment during the Civil war. He knew something of the iron business and that knowledge led him eventually into prospecting in the iron regions of the northern Michigan peninsula. There he fell in with his future partner, C. C. Merritt, and together they made their way to the head of Lake Superior, and thence up into the barren, hilly region to the north, where the physical features gave promise of rich ore deposits. It took but a cursory survey to prove the correctness of their belief. The next step was the development of the property. The ore itself which lay on the surface in a remarkably pure state, was easily mined, but facilities for transportation were entirely lacking. Brown turned his energies to the task of interesting capital. A little investigation satisfied one of the first men to whom he turned that the properties were valuable enough to serve as ample security for the loan asked.

The wise money-lender was John D. Rockefeller, who willingly loaned $1,000,000 to Brown and Merritt, secured by the claims themselves. Brown's next step was the construction of the Duluth and Iron Range railroad, over which the ore was carried from the wilderness to the ore docks at Duluth and Superior. Today this line is the greatest carrier of iron ore in the world. Negotiations were then entered into with James J. Hill and several associates for the sale of the property. When the deal was practically closed, and the purchasers were about to make their first payment on a purchase price that would have made Brown and Merritt beyond their wildest dreams, Brown, suspecting nothing, told of the transfer to a close associate of Rockefeller.

At once it became evident that Rockefeller had considered his loan merely as an entering wedge which was to admit him to complete possession. Powerful influences, Brown always maintained, were immediately set to work to obstruct and eventually to prevent the sale to Hill and his associates. At any rate, before Brown could enlist the support of other moneyed interests his notes to Rockefeller fell due, he defaulted in payment, the mortgage was foreclosed, and the Standard Oil magnate became the owner of the richest iron mines in the country for a mere fractional part of their value. Within five weeks after this climax Merritt died broken-hearted. Brown's cheerful optimism enabled him to get on his feet again financially, and he settled at the "Soo" where he met with some little success as a mining broker. But it was an uphill fight; a succession of failures lead to a physical breakdown, and the strong man and good fighter succumbed. Rockefeller had expressed a desire to be better known by his countrymen. Here was a man who knew him not wisely but perhaps too well.—New York Post.
