Modern Palestine.

(Dundee 'Advertiser'.)

If Palestine is not precisely a land flowing with milk and honey in modern times, it is still not doing badly, according to the consular report of Mr. Dickson, just issued. It is particularly fertile in oranges, which it exported to the value of £114,650 last year, chiefly to Scotland, the trade, we are told, being steadily increasing.

Wines and spirits, too, are becoming important, the Jewish colonies displaying considerable activity in the cultivation of the grape, which was very abundant last year. Watermelons are also plentiful. The total value of the imports of Palestine last year was £821,820. Consular reports are sometimes curious in the way they lump trades together.

We find Consul Dickson saying: 'As regards other articles of export, there was an increase in religious ornaments and hides.' It may be noted that it is the Americans who are after the religious ornaments of Palestine. People who desire to send their friends to Jericho will be interested to hear that a new carriage road will be completed down to the Dead Sea and Jericho in the course of a year. Then, if anybody wants to send a telegram to Beersheba, the thing can be done on the customary terms. Beersheba in these days only consists of fifty dwellings, but it is 'rising in importance.'
