They were many of the very many friends of John Kearney and family and they were going to their home to congratulate him and his wife on the tenth anniversary of their marriage. After reaching the house and the occupants being convinced it was not a hostile invasion, the large hall and parlors were thrown open and the fun commenced. Mr. and Mrs. Kearney were ushered into the parlor by Miss Maddox and A. D. McCain, when they were presented with an address and a silver tray and oil painting. Mr. Kearney in reply to the address said "he was taken so by surprise that he found it hard to find words to convey to them the joy and pleasure it gave his mother, wife, and himself, in welcoming them to his home. And it was always his greatest delight to see his friends gather round his fireside, but confessed when he saw them approaching he thought it Coxe's army or a fenian invasion. His mind was greatly relieved, however, when he found they were the friends of his native place, coming to wish him well. Then followed a short programme after which dancing, games, and music were enjoyed until three o'clock in the morning.
