A prominent physician, famous for his success in the treatment of kidney and bladder diseases, attributes a great deal of his success to the following simple vegetable prescription:—
 One ounce Fluid Extract Dandelion;
 One ounce Compound Salatone;
 Four ounces Compound Syrup Sarsaparilla;
 Mix, shake well, and take in teaspoonful doses after each meal and again at bedtime.
 Your druggist can supply the ingredients, and the mixture can be prepared at home at very little expense.
 This, the doctor says, acts directly on the kidneys, assisting them to filter the poisons from the blood and expel same in the urine, at the same time restoring the kidneys to healthy, normal action.
 We feel that a great many readers will be pleased to learn of this simple prescription, and knowing the ability of the physician whose formula it is, we do not hesitate to recommend it to any sufferer.

Poetic Justice.

The talk had turned upon justice, and Benson, who had made and admired money, was quick to declare that justice was not in the world at present, since its counterfeit may be purchased for dollars.

The quiet man in the corner stopped blowing smoke rings long enough to dissent.

"Justice may not be procurable from men," he said, tersely, "but the higher power that rules certain matters—call it God, fate, chance, what you will—sometimes deals out justice so poetic as to partake of the nature of swift retribution. I heard a telling story of this kind today. I don't know the participants, but I've known of some of them for ages, and, knowing my informant as I do, I know the tale is true in every detail.

"A girl and a man loved each other. They were not formally engaged, perhaps, but everybody around knew of their attachment, and the man's long courtship of the girl made the matter more prominent. Then suddenly the man, growing more ambitious, decided he must marry money. He paid devoted suit to a rich man's daughter, and, somewhat to the surprise of her friends, who had thought her affections engaged elsewhere, was successful. They were married and things promised exceeding well for everyone but the little girl with the sore heart.

"But here's where the justice part of the episode becomes evident. The man no sooner was married to the rich woman than he knew what a bitter mistake—not to say wrong—he'd committed. The rich woman didn't love him. Soon she made no secret of the fact that she, too, was disappointed. She not only told him but half a dozen of his friends into the bargain that she'd never loved him, had only married him out of pique, because the man she really loved wouldn't look at her. Her father lost all the coveted money before they'd been married a year, and life became grey indeed for the man who'd sold his birthright for a mess of pottage.

"To cap the climax the little girl thrown over for the missing dollars grew sweeter than ever under the sad but ripening experience, and last week, as my informant told me, she was unexpectedly left a large fortune. If justice wasn't there and then accomplished I miss my guess!"

From the edge of the group a weary looking individual rose, yawning, as the speaker's voice sank to silence, but otherwise there was no comment on the story.

"Well, you're a nice lot of fishes," commented the narrator with indignation. "What's the matter with my argument about justice, I'd like to know?"

"Nothing at all," replied the club gossip, with an irrepressible chuckle. "Only—that story happened right in our set and we all know a little more about it than you do. The girl who was thrown over bore her heartache bravely, recovered in due season, and next week is to marry a man who adores her and whom she loves ten times as well as ever she did the other. And the man who has just gone out is the hero of your tale.—Grace Burton, in Chicago Tribune.

Best Medicine in the World for Colic and Diarrhoea.

"I find Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy to be the best remedy in the world," says Mr. C. L. Carter of Skirum, Ala. "I am subject to colic and diarrhoea. Last spring I seemed as though I would die, and I think I would if I hadn't taken Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. I haven't been troubled with it since until this week, when I had a very severe attack and took half a bottle of the twenty-five cent size Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy, and this morning I feel like a new man." Bathos.

Bathos is a good word, happily coined. It is pretty near pathos, so near that conscientious typesetters and proofreaders often change the "b" to the "p" they believe ought to have been intended and thus ruin the best intended efforts of the men who write. We trust our own attempt may run the gauntlet unscathed.

Yes, bathos is a good word. It describes stuff that is presumed to pass as pathos by those who put it forth, but that is wholly dragged down from its high estate by some element of the farcical and absurd that makes its intended sadness a merry jest for the judicious. It is grief with the snuffles, well meant, perhaps, but undignified and unimpressive.

Financial men, especially those engaged in the great game of stock speculation, are often addicted to bathos. They weep crocodile tears over the distress that is bound to ensue when the law or some other form of government pulls them up with a round turn. They mourn at the "destruction of confidence" and other terrible things that are bound to happen if the trusts are criticized or assailed. New York brokerage houses are particularly great on this sort of thing. Take this for a sample put forth by the stock exchange house of Watson & Co. anent the move by the government on the tobacco trust.

"It has been again demonstrated how useless it is to endeavour to inspire confidence and hope in financial sentiment by a renewal of marked activity while the President of the United States is permitted to experiment with his insane theories of upsetting and rebuilding the business enterprises of this country, in which millions of dollars of widows and orphans and like innocent investors are involved, and who are gradually becoming so disturbed as to the validity of their investments that it would surprise no one to witness an investors' panic from this quarter resulting from this one man's domineering will, which would protest and see the attempt made to overthrow results of the work of years is difficult to understand. It seems that the greater the liberty of action given the more nonsensical and more radical the next step taken, as the action about to be commenced against the American Tobacco Company attests.

"Perhaps if sufficient rope is given he may yet entangle himself, and it may be the hope he will do so that silences protest."

If ever there was bathos on the face of the earth, there it is now. Alas, the poor "widows and orphans," how valiantly they are doing service again. It matters not that an almost infinitesimal quantity of them are at all interested in the shares of the tobacco trust, their rights are being undermined just the same. It matters not that a lot of the most greedy and conscienceless monopolists on the footstool have been asked to stop their peculiar kind of transactions—the defenceless "widows and orphans" are invoked. It is enough to make even the most solemn and rheumatic horse roar with laughter.—Boston Tribune.

The Doctor Away from Home when Most Needed.

People are often very much disappointed to find that their family physician is away from home when they most need his services. Diseases like cramp colic and cholera morbus require prompt treatment, and have in many instances proven fatal before medicine could be procured or a physician summoned. The right way is to keep at hand a bottle of Chamberlain's Colic, Cholera and Diarrhoea Remedy. No physician can prescribe a better medicine for these diseases. By having it in the house you escape much pain and suffering and all risk. Buy it now; it may save life. For sale by All Dealers.

Dr. Adler on Oriental Culture.

Dr. Cyrus Adler, in a recent address in which he urged the establishment of a ten-million-dollar fund for the general advance of Jewish and Oriental learning, said:

"I am not averse to taking in the Far East, Japan and China and India, for it is time to make this boastful Western world realize that the Orient, more than the Occident, is synonymous with learning and culture, with great moral and religious truths and philosophy, and in short everything that really deserves to be called civilization. No less an authority than Paulsen, the erudite professor of philosophy at the University of Berlin, has stated that the rise in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries of the first universities in France and Italy, as well as in Spain and England was initially due to the crusaders through bringing the Western peoples into contact with Orientals, and placing the religion and civilization of the Arabians within the European intellectual horizon.

I recall a story which may be apocryphal, to the effect that during the recent Russo-Japanese war, after one of the numerous victories of the Japanese arms, a gentleman met a Japanese ambassador and congratulated him upon the great advances which his nation had made. The ambassador said in reply: "For twenty or thirty years you know us here by beautiful silks and paintings and delicate pottery and lacquer work and other like products of our ancient native arts, and you called us semi-civilized, and now that we have learned to use your arms and can slaughter with them more effectively than you can, we are called civilized."

The Oriental nations have made great efforts to learn and assimilate the mechanical and scientific advances of the Western world. Let us hope that this Western world may make due effort to learn and utilize the results of the civilization, ancient, and modern, of the Eastern world."

The occasion was an address at the commencement exercises of the Jewish Theological Society of America. Of Jewish culture Dr. Adler said:

"The ancient Jewish academies of Babylonia, and the mediæval ones of Spain and France left no genuine successors. The oldest modern rabbinical seminary is barely beyond its fiftieth anniversary. Bitter persecution destroyed in the course of time most of the ancient centres of Jewish learning, and migration to new countries required the establishment of new institutions, and to a certain extent the creation of new traditions."

But I think the time has come to make a still further advance. In the neighboring city of Philadelphia, a Jewish collegiate organization, due to the foresight of Hyman Gratz, has been in existence for over ten years, and another of higher standard and wider scope, created through the munificence of the late Moses A. Dropsie, is about to be formed. Every step should, in my opinion, be taken to bring these institutions into absolute accord, so that the one may supplement the other; that the watchword of each should be cooperation and not monopoly; that they should unitedly undertake to effect a real organization of the Jewish educational forces in the three greater cities of New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore, and ultimately of the whole country. I believe it to be possible to effect such an organization as will insure the most absolute cooperation with the least danger of destroying the autonomy of any one institution.

The term university is one which I should like to see applied to this proposed organization. A university is not of necessity a single corporation, nor need it consist of buildings, or of various faculties, or even entirely of schools of higher learning. It may be an aggregation of individual corporations or it may extend over the whole educational system. A university is, in the words of the author of "Universities of Europe in the Middle Ages" (Rashdal), an attempt to realize in concrete form an ideal of life in one of its aspects, and he further declares that ideals pass into great historic forces by embodying themselves in institutions.

The Jewish people through their literature and religion have contributed more to modern civilization than any other single force. The ancient peoples with whom they were in association around the Mediterranean during the time of their various national existences have contributed more to modern civilization than all other forces put together, and all people who have lived in the intervening time. This fact, so important for a proper understanding of the world's history, is virtually forgotten. The Jews of this country owe it to themselves and owe it to the world to promote this knowledge in an impartial manner with every means at their command.

A President Who Refused a Pass.

In the archives of the Pennsylvania Railway has been found a letter from James Buchanan, written when he was President of United States, declining an offer of a free pass on the Northern Central Railroad. The letter came into the possession of the Pennsylvania Railroad when the road acquired control of the Northern Central. The letter as given by the Philadelphia correspondent for the New York World follows: "Washington, 24 March, 1859.—Dear Sir: I return the free ticket which Mr. Gittings has directed to be forwarded to me for the Northern Central Railroad with as many thanks for his kindness as though I had accepted. It has been the practise of my life not to travel free on any railroad, being opposed to the whole system of granting such privileges to individuals not connected with these roads. Yours, very respectfully, James Buchanan."

The Release of Convicts.

The release of convicts by the government before the expiry of the sentences has become so common of late that it is a question whether it is worth while maintaining expensive courts and bodies of constabulary for the purpose of sending offenders to jail to be pardoned. If the man having the slightest pull, or even some little notoriety, be sent to jail now, his friends are in action immediately. The petition is hawked about and signed by men who ought to know better. Delegations of influential men make life painful for the government people and in due course the scoundrel is released to liberty, and the pursuit of happiness in his peculiar way.
