Horse Flesh as Food in Paris.

According to the latest statistics, horseflesh as an article of diet is undoubtedly increasing in favor among the Parisians. Last year 48,298 horses were killed for food, which is 5,000 more than in the previous year. These animals yielded 26,600,000 pounds of meat.

This increase in hippophagism, as the consumption of horseflesh is curiously if classically called, coincides with the sudden and extraordinary development of the taximotor, which is rapidly replacing the cab of former days. One is forced to the painful conclusion that Paris is eating up her superseded and unwanted cab horses. Yet to any one who has witnessed the maltreatment of the cab horse by his ignorant and brutal Parislam driver the conclusion is not so painful after: all, since surely a sharp, quick stroke with a skillful butcher's knife is preferable to the years of semi-starvation, utter exhaustion, and continuous beatings that the Paris cab. horse has been condemned to bear heretofore.

Horse meat is supposed to be bought only by poor families who cannot afford to pay the exorbitant prices charged for beef and metton, and the butchers who sell it are supposed to show a wooden horse's head over the door or somewhere in plain sight. But it is an open secret that many restaurant keepers serve it in succulent stews to their unsuspecting customers, and there are butchers who sell as beef and mutton flesh of the cab horse or any kind of horse.

Many stories are told of American students living in the Latin Quarter, who have a French woman to keep house for them, and de all their marketing, and who have boasted of her virtues, her economies, etc., then one painful day have discovered that Marie's gernished dishes have frequently been disgzised horse meat. The happiest are those who never discover this.
