Coldest Place in The World Over Equator

The coldest place in the world is almost exactly above the equator. But it is considerably above—some twelve miles up in the air. The thermometer at that point registers nearly 120 degrees below zero. This fact has been demonstrated by means of a balloon used by a German scientific expedition in Africa. The temperature of the air falls steadily as one rises until a height varying from seven to eleven miles is reached; then it rises again until a comparatively even level is reached and this even level is retained to as great a height as balloons containing thermometers have been sent.

Wm Booth at the End of the Day.

(London Correspondence of The Globe.)

London, July 12.—There are not many national memorials to great movements in the east end of London. That dreary stretch of terraced tenements that lies east of Aldgate Pump does not offer temptations to the builder of monuments or other commemorations. The Mile-end road, which is really, in part at least, a noble thoroughfare, concealing behind its handsome front many sordid slums, has one distinguished memorial to a great effort for social betterment. This is the People's Palace, which owes its origin to the late Sir Walter Besant. In his novel, "All sort and Conditions of Men, Besant, who was not then collaborating with James Rice, described a great building in the east end of London, conducted by a wealthy young woman, where poor girls and boys received an education and some sort of training for a higher and better life. The reading of this novel so impressed the daughter of a wealthy brewer that she forthwith set to work to give reality to the novelist's dream. The result was the People's Palace, which still carries on a beneficent work in the east end.

Now the Mile-end road has had another memorial of a great movement, a plain and simple one: nothing but a stone at Mile-end Way to mark the spot where General Booth preached the first open-air sermon which determined his future career and led to the formation of the Salvation Army. When the history of the world's great religious revivals comes to be written one of the most thrilling pages will be that in which is recorded that awakening of the sad and distressed east end of London to the realities of a revival. The spot where William Booth, the ex-communicated young Methodist preacher, stood on the memorial evening forty-five years ago has been marked by a stone bearing the inscription, "Here William Booth commenced the work of the Salvation Army, July, in 1865." The exact site is on a new garden strip opposite the Mile-end Great Assembly Hall.

General Booth is an "old ancient" man now, yet to one who, like myself, has been privileged to meet and talk with him on the anniversary of every birthday, and on his return from foreign tours, the years do not seem to make much impression on him. He still has the straight, slim figure of a young man, but his wrinkled face and coronal of white hair and flowing white beard tell of his eighty odd years. He is still keen for work, and in the tiny, plainly furnished back room of his very modest home at Hadley Wood in the northern outskirts of London he is writing his autobiography in the intervals between meetings and Salvation Army work in all parts of the country. When finished, this autobiography will be a memorable work, filling up and rounding out an important chapter in the social and spiritual history of Britain, and describing the beginning and progress of what Besant called "The Great Endeavor." The book will have its world-wide interest, too, for in its late phases it will deal with the remarkable overseas development of William Booth's great organization. On its purely spiritual side the "autobiography" should have a wonderful fascination as a study in spiritual growth and inheritance. It will show how a Nottingham merchant's son, who might have become through sheer business ability a great merchant prince, abandoned commerce and took to great preaching, cutting himself at the same time adrift from the Church of England, in which he had been brought up. And it will show his successive changes from Wesleyanism, with which he first allied himself, to Congregationalism, then to the Methodist New Connexion, and finally, a free man, as the pioneer on the Mile-end Waste of a movement which its opponents thought to stifle with sneers at "Corybantic Christianity."

The writing of the book is proceeding by fits and starts, for General Booth in this, as in other matters, is autocratic and will allow no interference with his methods. The life of the Booth family at Hadley Wood is ideally simple. Mr. Bramwell Booth, the General's eldest son and chief of the staff lives with his family close at hand, and every morning, before he leaves for London, visits his father. Whatever work is in hand at the moment is put aside while the two converse on the affairs of the Salvation Army or on matters of public interest. It is an interesting fact that every officer of the Salvation Army, no matter how high his rank on the staff, is also a common soldier on the roll book of one of the corps. Thus General Booth himself is a soldier of the Barnett Corps, and although he is unable to attend the meetings, he "fires his cartridge," otherwise pays his subscription into the branch every week. For this reason the news brought by his grandchildren from the Barnett branch always interests him greatly, and their visits are responsible for many a delay in the composition of the "auto-biography." General Booth is a strict vegetarian, and his needs in the matter of food are carefully looked after by a little housekeeper, an old-time Salvationist, whom the General regards with a deep affection. As with all his friends and visitors, the General enjoys a little joke at the expense of his old housekeeper, and he tells how, after returning from a deeply interesting visit to the late King and Queen Alexandra at Buckingham Palace, he caught himself addressing his little housekeeper as "Your Majesty." He keeps up the joke still, much to the old lady's confusion. But she takes it in good part, and her master's jocularities makes no difference in her devotion. Every morning when the summons comes she brings him his cup of strong tea—stronger than most people who have a care for their nerves would care to drink—and some thin slices of bread and butter. That is his frugal breakfast, and for lunch there is dry toast, with sometimes vegetable broth, followed by a cup of coffee. Between the two meals he lies down for a short rest, and then, with rare exceptions, the day is spent in constant work. Sometimes he goes for a short walk in the neighborhood accompanied by a faithful dog. The "autobiography" will cover a period of sixty-five years of active work, and the general does not mind confessing that one of his inspirations in his task is the portrait, hanging in his room, of his dead wife, the "mother" of the Salvation Army, the courageous woman who, when the Methodist New Connexion decided to send William Booth on pastoral work, instead of giving him the revival work for which his heart longed, echoed his "never" from the gallery, and so determined his new start in life.—J F W.—Toronto Globe.

Will Can Whale Meat.

Oakland, Cal, July 16.—With the hope of impaling the meat trust the whaling harpoons are going to set to work in the Northern Pacific waters by the crew of the whaling schooner Letitia, which is being made ready to put forth with William Macomber as mate, for a cruise in Behring Sea.

The whaler, Mr Macomber declares, will return with 20,000 pounds of canned whale meat, which, he affirms, is as palatable as veal and should play the merry mischief with the high prices of beef.

The whaler, which is the first to be outfitted at Oakland, is equipped with harpoons, bomb guns, try pots and all the equipment of whale fishing and will carry as an additional cargo a miniature cannery, which Macomber will utilize in preserving the whale meat.

If the new food meets with the success he thinks it will, Macomber intends to form a company, install a large canning plant, charter a vessel and make a business of following the whaling fleets in the Behring and Arctic seas, buying up the whale carcasses after the blubber has been stripped and canning the meat for American consumption.

A Daily Thought.

No one leads so calm a life as he who thinks but little of himself.—St Augustine

Try rubbing soap and chalk mixed on milk-dewed spots.

Breadcrumbs are easily prepared if run through the finest cogs the meat chopper.

Try putting horseradish through a meat chopper instead of grating it. It is much less trying to prepare.

Should there be white marks left on a highly polished table from hot dishes, use olive oil and salt without delay. Spread over marks and leave for an hour or two, when the stain should be gone.

Try several shades of silk together in one needle when mending plaids or checks, using colors to harmonize with the predominating tones of the material. The mended part will scarcely show after it is pressed.
