IF I WERE CARNEGIE
If only I were Carnegie,
With coin to give away, I'd hang up money prizes for The things we need today.
I'd give a million to the man Who would invent a scheme Whereby the janitor could sleep And still let us have steam.
I'd give a heap of money for A fountain pen I think, That one could fill and not appear As though he'd bathed in ink.
I'd hire somebody to invent A keyhole with a light, For use when I come home from lodge At ten o'clock at night.
I'm sure I'd give a million to The man who would devise A flannel undershirt that would When washed, not shrink in size.
And when he had invented that I'd make him doubly rich.
If he'd denature the stuff And cure it of its itch.
If only I were Carnegie
With coin to give away,
I'd offer money to the man Or woman for a play.
That wasn't built on naughty themes,
Or filled with silly slash, A play that grandmas might behold And never have to blush.
Edgar A Guest.

THE CLIMBER.
List, oh! list, children, to the sad, sad story of Master Tobias Tickle-mouse, bottom boy of the third form in the Select Academy for Young Gentlemen, never mind where.
Master Tobias wore spectacles, which helped him to see into other people's affairs; and he had a long, sharp nose, which he was always poking into other people's business.
In fact, people who did not love him (and there were several) said he was too inquisitive; and even his nurse, who doted on him, admitted that he never liked to miss any thing. One winter afternoon Master Tobias hurried home from school, for he had been asked out to tea, and as soon as he had read all his father's postcards on the hall table he went upstairs, and nurse assisted him into his best suit. His mother helped him on with his best overcoat. He put his gloves on himself, all except buttoning, and then out he set for the house where he was to have tea. In the next street he stopped to look through a little hole in the whitening of an unoccupied shop window, where some workmen were busy, and he read several labels on the boxes at the back of a Carter Patterson's van. Then he stared through the open window of a public-house until a workman said, 'Ello, pointer! Good deg!
Or is yer name blinkers, sonny?' This seemed to Master Tobias quite rude. But he did not tell him his name was Ticklemouse. He just went on to the street in which his friends lived. By now it was quite dark, but, of course, he could see the lamps all right, for they were alight. And it was a lamp that accounts for this sad story.
Our particular lamp was just near the house where Master Tobias was expecting to have his tea; and as he drew near it he noticed that to the arm of the post just below the lamp itself a rough sign had been fastened by string. The sign had on it a badly-painted inscription, and Master Tobias, of course, stopped to try and read it. But for all his spectacles and great eyes that bulged and were screwed by turns, and despite even his sharp nose, he could only make out one single E. This was tantalizing, for the inscription might even be 'Vote for Ticklemouse. So he just had to read it somehow.
If he rang the bell and asked his friends to lend him a telescope he knew they would laugh at him for being so curious. So he did something else. Master Tobias was a monkey for climbing. So after looking round to see that no policeman was near, he just swarmed up the post in one hundred and three seconds. He came down in fifty, for the inscription on the sign was 'Wet Paint.'

Poor Tobias Poor Master Ticklemouse!
The lamp post was wet and red; of course, his best clothes were a picture, especially the trouser legs. He thought of crying; and he put a gloved hand to his face by way of beginning. Then the red paint on his gloves came off on his nose; and he dared not cry for fear his tears might become colored also and make his face a sight. It was all very pathetic; and what was more he could not go to tea. He just had to run home; and, of course, on the way, a horrid street boy called out, 'Go it, old zebra! Stripes for ever, especially red uns.' He reached home at last, and had to confess; and when his father came in from business he grumbled and said the whole house smelt of torpentine. Tobias knew the end of his nose did, for they had to use it to wash off the paint; and he was quite glad his father was not cross with him. But he did not enjoy it when his father said, 'Serve you right, old man. You should not be so curious. Children ought to notice when others are in trouble and should try and help them, and they ought to be interested in the doings of those who love them. But listening when they shouldn't and looking through keyholes and reading what isn't meant for them, such as other people's postcards, and being inquisitive and curious instead of minding their own business, all this is wrong and leads to trouble sooner or latter. So off to bed, my

Mr Andrew Carnegie announced on Saturday an addition gift of $10,000,000 to the Carnegie Institution at Washington, making its total endowment $25,000,000 and bringing the amount of Mr Carnegie's philanthropies close to $200,000,000. The Carnegie Institution was founded in 1902 for purposes of higher education and advanced research.
The original endowment was $10,000,000 to which further gifts were added, making it $15,000,000, until this last gift was announced.

Three members of a company of thirty men of the German submarine boat U-9, which sank in the harbor of Kiel last week, were found dead in the coming tower of the vessel when it was brought to the surface.
They were the two officers in charge of the boat and the cox-wain. The others of the crew all made their escape by putting on divers' helmets and shooting themselves out through the torpedo tube.
The plague which has been devastating Manchuria and Northern China has at last reached Peking. A number of Americans and Europeans, most of them women and children, are leaving the country. The Chinese officers have to a large extent surrendered command of the fight to the missionary physicians.
Dublin hears that King George and Queen Mary will make a brief visit to Ireland probably in July or August. They will reside in the Vice Royal Lodge, and will hold a series of entertainments.

The Reichstag, after debating the second reading of the government's unearned increment tax bill, adopted an amendment subjecting the German sovereign houses to the tax. The government is strongly opposed to this innovation in German constitutionalism A general strike of laborers and small growers has begun throughout the island of Guadaloupe, owing to the refusal of the sugar manufacturers to pay the wages demanded.
The sugar cane remains uncultivated and the grinding factories are idle. The strikers declare that they will not resume work until the concessions sought have been made.
The Dublin Independent says that the government will appoint a commission to investigate Irish Finances, with a view to establishing home rule, and will appoint a committee of the Cabinet to frame a home rule measure. Lord Courtney of Penwith has written to Thomas Sexton, chairman of the Freeman's Journal Company, saying that the time has come to recognize the facts and prepare for home rule. The writer, though rated as a Liberal, has been a Unionist in Irish matters, and has heretofore opposed home rule. In his letter he describes himself as a Unionist. He proposes a plan to insure the representation of all elements in the Assembly by dividing the country between two or three constituencies, each electing five members, and a group of constituencies, each returning three members.

French opinion, according to Paris correspondents, is greatly occupied with Holland's proposal to fortify Flushing, because it interprets the move as indicating the intention of the Netherlands to throw in her lot with the Triple Alliance in the event of an Anglo-Franco-German conflict. The semi-official press says that the fortification would have no political justification unless intended to guard against an attack by Great Britain, which Holland has no reason to fear if not tied up with Germany.

Hayti and Santo Domingo are again quarrelling over their boundary and are now hurry-ing troops to the frontier.
