Did you see him, talk to him? Did he suffer much? Was he in pain? What did he say? ... The Padre's voice as he answered, and he blessed God that it was in his power so to answer. 'He knew he was dying from the moment we brought him in. He did not talk very much at all after he had directed me what to do with his things. But he was ready to listen—may he loved to listen. I never left his side for one moment during these long hours, except when once, under the influence of an opiate, he slept. Quite near the end he looked at me and said very clearly and quietly: 'You'll see the matter, won't you? And—tell her it's all right, and that I was not afraid to die?'

After A Year

(St. John Globe) A special correspondent in the British Headquarters in France sums up the whole position of the war from the British side in the following words, and incidentally gives some wise advice to accept with caution the American newspapers' denunciations as to "drives" and "sweeps" that after through and color the whole Canadian idea of what is going on. I think the traditional reproach that we always underestimated our enemies, cannot, at any rate, be applied to British officers in this war. We have realized what we are up against from the first. The experience of the early days have left a lasting impression. For a while the Germans swamped us. For a year we have hardly budged them. In consequence it has become a habit of thought to regard the position as unchanged, to talk about the 'stalemate'. On the whole I do not say that this is a bad condition of things. Pessimism is preferable to over-confidence in war time. But anyone who really believes that the position is the same to-day as it was a year ago because the line is very much the same has no knowledge of the truth. There were desperately holding back the German push for Calais. Today the Bochs are crouching defensively opposite the top dog, wondering when he will make his next spring. There are still scattered correspondents in neutral countries who regard their readers with stances of great German preparations for a renewed Western offensive. Those preparations may be going on in Amsterdam or Bern or anywhere else where the correspondent in question hails from. My own opinion is that these gentlemen are the unwitting agents of the German wirepullers who are only concerned in bolstering up public opinion in the Fatherland and influencing neutral views. Germany will have to get rid of some of her other adventures before she can talk about preparing for another offensive in Flanders.
