

Assassination of Montenegrin Generals

Paris, Feb. 1.—The Rome correspondent of the Journal reports that General Beir and another Montenegrin general have been assassinated by patriots in Montenegro, who opposed the capitulation to Austria. General Beir had been entrusted by a provisional government in Montenegro with negotiations for capitulation.

[According to a statement issued by the Overseas News Agency of Berlin, on January 28 General Beir and Major Lompar, as delegates for the Montenegrin government, signed agreements at Cetinje, on Jan 25, with the Austro-Hungarian lieutenant, Field Marshal von Honor and Major Schuppich, for the practical surrender of the Montenegrin army.

The Shadowed Way

Martha Mason's pastor met her at the door. He had been watching for her. Many times during the two weeks past he had stood at his study window, looking down the street, his heart full of longing for this girl, fighting her battle alone. The eyes she lifted to him held no tears; instead, they were hot with rebellion.

"I can't help it," she cried. "I shall shock you, and I suppose it is wicked, but I almost hate God when I think how He let my mother suffer through those months. To have the agony drag on and on when the play was played out and the curtain down! Doctor Howe, I couldn't have done it to my worst enemy. It was cruel, cruel, cruel! Once—they never meant to let me know the worst—but once, when they didn't know I was near, I heard her cry. I don't know how many nights since I have waked with that cry in my ears."

"But, child, it is over now," the old pastor said, pityingly. "You would not wrong her more than by holding to the pain when hers is over."

"But it was!" the girl retorted, fiercely. "It was, and nothing can ever undo it."

"Did she complain?"

Martha's head lifted proudly, her voice was full of indignation. "Mother complain! Why, Doctor Howe, you knew her. The times—like that I heard—she didn't know. She was the bravest—so brave that it seems to me sometimes I can't bear it. You know, Doctor Howe—how could you ask me?"

"Fifteen years ago," her pastor replied, "a certain famous scholar in one of our universities was stricken with mortal illness. He knew—everybody knew from the very first—there was no hope. He suffered intensely—as much as your mother. But he was stronger and had more physical resistance, so he could keep upon his feet longer. To the last day possible—long beyond the time physicians said it would be possible—he was at his desk in his lecture-room. When that became no longer possible he still worked, in every rational moment, planning future courses exactly as if he were to live and lecture for twenty years."

"I cannot tell you, as the weeks went on, the feeling of awe that came over the students. It was, one of them said afterward, a practising immortality. When they died they decorated the chapel with flags and sang songs of victory. In the meeting the students held afterward in his memory there was but one note from beginning to end—that great though his loss was the scholarship of the country, the gift of his faith and devotion was intimately greater.

"Of definite actual results in the lives of those students I do not know—I left the city that year and could not follow them. But nobody who attended that memorial service could ever doubt that his acceptance of his sentence, and his bearing of those weeks of agony steadfastly, absolutely without complaint as an unquestioned part of his duty to his Master, was the greatest service of a life filed with service."

Martha said nothing, but by this time she was listening earnestly, breathlessly.

"Among your mother's nurses, I happen to know, was one who was struggling with doubts. Do you think she will be able to forget what she has seen? What do you and I know of the work your mother was doing for God through those weeks—she whose whole heart turned toward Him, whose whole longing was to serve Him? Do you think He would ever let that suffering be wasted? Don't you think that you and I, blind and ignorant as we are, may safely leave it with Him whose love he never doubted?"

Silently Martha rose. She could not speak, but her hand-clasp spoke for her. The old minister's eyes were full of tenderness as he watched her down the street.—"Youth's Companion."
