The Pan-German Arch

(Toronto Daily News.)

A writer in The Nineteenth Century insists upon the breaking up of the cumbersome Austrian Empire as essential to a satisfactory peace settlement. Three years of such fighting and spending as the world had thought impossible have come and gone and Mittel Europa is still a fact. The Kaiser reigns, in person or by deputy, from the North Sea fronting Britain to within a few leagues of Egypt and Persia. He is supreme War-Lord in Brussels and Vienna, Sofia and Stamboul, in Smyrna, Damascus, Jerusalem, Mosul. From Berlin almost to Bagdad his trains run, his soldiers march. Germany could afford at present to give up Belgium and Serbia, perhaps even to come to terms with Poland, provided that we left her in the position she now holds towards her three confederates, or more truly vassals, Austria, Bulgaria, Turkey. Austria forms the solid key stone of the mighty pan-German arch stretching across Europe and planted firmly in Asia. It is held together by the domination of the Teuton and Magyar elements in the population over a number of lesser races. If the votes of the great majority of those who inhabit Austro-Hungary could be taken today it would disappear from the map to morrow. No reason remains, therefore, why the peace terms should not provide for the reversion of the Dual Monarchy into its constituent elements.
