Even to Dennis's uncultivated eye there was a rigidity and formality about the whole establishment not artistic. At first it was but a feeling – a vague impression that grew upon him without his scarcely knowing why. He soon discovered however that every thing was arranged squarely, according to system, order, and not with a view of placing in the best lights and shadows the beautiful things to be sold. He saw that Mr. Luddolph was annoyed by the same defect One bright day, when everything stood out with glaring distinctness, he seemed provoked beyond measure by this inartistic rigidity, and stormed through the store at a great rate.

From that day forward the hand and taste of Dennis Fleet began gradually, and almost imperceptibly at first, to give a new aspect and create a new atmosphere in the "Temple of Art." But at first he was kept busy enough at his humble routine duties. Everyone felt and expressed a little surprise at his getting into harness so quickly, but the heavy atmosphere that Mr. Schwartz pervaded was not conducive to conversation or emotions however faint. All went forward quietly and orderly, like well oiled machinery. Customers received every attention, and though many no doubt had the undefined feeling that something was wrong in the arrangement of the store, they all found an abundance of beautiful things suited to the taste and purse of each, and so trade was good, even though the holiday season was over.
