Barriers Burned Away.

BY THE REV. EDWARD P. ROWE.

CHAPTER XXII.

IS SHE A GENTLEMAN?

The days and weeks that followed were to Dennis such as only come once in a lifetime, and not in every lifetime either. A true, pure love was growing up within his heart—growing as the little girl develops in strength and pleasurable life, and yet unconsciously to itself. It seemed as if some strong magnetic wand had touched the world or him. Every day was transfigured, and no wonder—land was more full of interest than that which he existed. His life was a waking dream in which nothing was definite, but all things abounded in hope and happy suggestion. He compared them afterwards to a tropical island of the Pacific, a blissful fragment of life itself, utterly distinct from the harsh struggling years that preceded, and the painful awakening that followed.

life in the great city had often been very lonely. He expected to be treated as an equal as a matter of course, the artistic entertainment in which he was to participate. In his business relations at the store he had taken a subordinate position and made up his mind to be invited to a private house, and would appear there possessing all the qualities of a gentleman, he surely would be treated as one.

Is not this Chicago, where nearly all its citizens were poor a few years ago? He thought, and surely if what Miss Ludolph says is true, I have advantages in my taste over most poor young men. Moreover it was his ideal of an entertainment, where art and music should take the place of the vulgar pleasures of eating, drinking, and dancing. Chief of all, Christine would be there, and even he in his blindness became a more honest and self-conscious as he realized how this thought towered above the others.

She had given him a list of the things he was to bring with him in the afternoon, and he had occupied every spare moment in getting them ready. At quarter past two he summoned the carman of the store and they loaded up the miscellaneous cargo needed for the coming mystery, and by three, all were before the large elegant mansion to which he had been directed. Dennis rang the bell and was shown by a servant into the front parlor, where he found Miss Ludolph, Miss Brown, a tall, haughty brunette and the young lady of the house, Miss Winthrop, a bright sunny faced blonde, and two or three other young ladies of no special coloring in character, being introduced mainly to their toilets for the attractions.

They bowed to Miss Ludolph, and then turned toward the other ladies as if expecting as a matter of course to be introduced. No introduction came, but his expectant manner was so obvious, that Miss Ludolph colored, looked annoyed, and the young ladies tittered outright. Advancing a step or two she said coldly, "Mr. Fleet, you may help Mopsy carry the things into the parlor, and then we will direct you as to the arrangement."

Dennis crimsoned painfully. At first he was confused to think, and merely obeyed mechanically. Then came the impulse to say boldly that this kind of thing might answer at the store, but not here, and he nearly carried it out; but soon followed the sober second thought that such action would bring a blight over all his prospects, and involve the loss of his position at the store. Such giving way to passion would injure only himself, and he would rather suffer a momentary annoyance, to him and his result would be most disastrous. Why should he let those who cared not a jot for him cause such an injury?

By the time he had carried his first armful into the parlor, he had resolved for his mother and sisters' sakes that he would go through the following scenes as well as he could, and then turn his back on society till he could enter a reformed and dignified man. With compressed lips and flashing eyes he mentally vowed that he would never see her again. As he was unpacking his materials he could not help hearing the conversation in the front parlor.

"Did you ever see such presumption?" exclaimed Miss Ludolph. "He evidently expected to be introduced, and that was his right and courtesy all around." "He must have been better days, for he certainly looked like a gentleman," said Miss Winthrop.
