The Contest Across the Border.

"Tempus fugit," and November and its gloom and threatening of winter will soon be upon us, and upon our neighbors within addition, the Presidential election. Opinion, and the course of political events seem to be going against the Republicans. The prediction of the brilliant Blaine, that a successful campaign would be opened by a decided victory in Maine, has not been verified by the event. If it cannot be absolutely ascertained until the official count of votes in January 1881, that Plaisted the Democratic candidate has been elected governor, it is at least certain, that the Democratics made considerable gains in the other elections. Their success has been such as to elate the Democratic party throughout the Union, and to depress the confident hopes of the Republicans. Another reason for believing that the contest is going against the Republicans, is the disatisfaction evinced by the moderate section of the party, with the course that the extremists are taking. The head and front of these extremist is Senator Conkling, and it is his aim to arouse a bitter feeling of sectionalism, to Gents' and Boys' Tweeds, array the North in direct antagonism to the solid South. The nomination of Garfield, who was known by his professions, to favor conciliation with the South civil service reform, and all measures to promote commercial, trade, and industrial prosperity, sound currency and honest fulfillment of all obligations, was taken to mean a rebuff to the extremists the "machine men." But it news appears that Garfield cannot control them. He must follow their lead to victory or defeat. If it be true, that the moderate republicans are disgusted with the course that Conkling and tremists are hurrying Garfield to defeat. B., September 30, 1880. North, will be lost, if the Democrats gain the election. The South which really is not so solid as its enemies, declare which is so very much below the North in population, in wealth and revenue producing power, and is only part of the Democratic party, would never proach of any public occasion, never seem to be able to impose a policy that would undo the work of the last twenty years, and disturb the country to its foundations. The interests of the middle and other states which are now Democratic, are against any radical policy, that would produce wide spread disturbance, and were such policy attempted, there would be so many desertions from the Democratic party, that the Republicans would soon regain the balance, would be able to send a majority to both Houses of Congress, who would keep a southern sympathising President and Council in check. The Republican party may be defeated in the Presidental campaign, but sensible men, it is said, so far from looking with alarm on a Democratic victory, think that a defeat which would keep the Republicans out of power for four years, would be a wholesome lesson in humility and purification, and could not be disastrous

It may be that before long there will be pressing cause to deplore the wanton havoc and devastatlon by fire that have on this continent destroyed an immense acreage of valuable woods, and the carelessness and supineness which have done so little, by acts of forestry to remedy some of the great mischief that, by malice and accident, has been wrought in the forests.

Agitation and agragarian outrages are ripe in Ireland. Lord Montmorris, was on bad terms with his tennants, has been shot dead. His murder has, "it is said," excited little short of a panic among all the respectable classes. Party differences are for the time discarded in presence of common eminent danger.
