As we know, Flora Champion had not a noble wind responsible to bear feathers—she could scarcely bear to hear her cousin's name mentioned; and when she was told on credible authority that Lady Grace intended bringing her out the following season, her anger and jealousy knew no bounds. To think thank you for a cruelty that, after all, was know, Flora Champion had not a noble perhaps a kindness in disguise. Her grandfather's sarcasms and her mother's lamentations almost maddened her; she forgot the respect she owed to them, and was insolent and she owed to them, and was insolent and gry and reproached her—there was none of the great mesattrance in their family, should be introduced to society under more favorable auspices than even she herself had been! The notion was intolerable to the great mesattrance in their family, should be introduced to society under more favorable auspices than even she herself had been! The notion was intolerable to them, and was insolent and gry and reproached her—there was none and the fresh young novice in her first sullen. Scenes between her and Sir Howard were of frequent occurrence, and even her mother no longer took her part. She quarreled constantly with her brother, and the last and crowning part of her mortification was that he had fallen desperately in love with Winifred Eyre, and was desperately in love with Winifred Eyre, and was perpetually singing her.

"Flora," exclaimed her mother, petulantly, the same evening, "I think it is time something definite was settled between you and Lord Lancing. You have played with him quite long enough."

Miss Champion was silent.

"I will marry!" Flora vowed to herself, "and marry well. I shall never love anyone but Evelyn, and he does not care for me now. If a man as old as my grand-father asks me to be his wife, and he has rank and wealth, I will take him. Surely I have still beauty enough to hur love?"
