MRS. GRAHAM AT HOME. As the summer advanced, extensive preparations were commenced for repairing Woodlawn, which was to be fitted up in a style suited to the luxurious taste of its rightful owner, which, as report said, was in reality Durward. He had conceived a fancy for the place five years before, when visiting in the neighborhood, and on learning that it was for sale, he had purchased it, at the suggestion of his mother, proposing to his father that for a time, at least, he should be its nominal possessor. What reason he had for this he hardly knew himself unless it was that he disliked being flattered as a man of great wealth, choosing rather to be esteemed for what he really was. And, indeed, few of his age were more generally beloved than was he. Courteous, kind-hearted, and generous almost to a fault, he gained friends wherever he went, and it was with some reason that Mrs. Graham thought herself blessed above mothers, in the possession of such there's some mistake about it, I know. for the occasion, and she was beginning to a son. "He is so like me," she would Who brought them?" say, in speaking of his many virtues, when in fact, there was scarcely anything in common between them, for nearly all of Durward's sterling qualities were either sult of many years' companionship with his step father. "It does not lend her several little ornaments, and dowould watch a fly, was lying in wait for the unsuspecting Anna At last all was in residence at Woodlawn for the reception of Mrs. Graham, who came up early in October, bringing with her a larger train of house servants than was often seen in Woodford county. About three weeks after her arrival, invitations were issued for a party, or "house-warming," as the negroes termed it. Nero, Durward's valet, brought the tiny notes to Mr. Livingstone's, giving them into the care of Carrie, who took then immediately to her mother's room. "It's Durward's handwriting," said she, glancing at the superscriptions, and reading as she did so—"Mr. and Mrs. Livingstone "-" Mr. John Livingstone, Jr."-"Miss Carrie Livingstone "-" Miss Anna as her mother looked up inquiringly— said, "I suppose y "And, as I live, one for grandma—'MRS, "Ves." returned told her what it meant. For once in his life Mr. Graham had exercised the right of being master in his own house, declaring that if Mrs. Nichols were not invited with the family, there should be no party at all. Mrs. Graham saw that he was in earnest, and yielded the point, knowing that in all probability the old lady would that!"

Ward, in some concern.

John Jr.'s first impulse, as he afterwards said, was "to knock him off from his horse," but a second thought convinced him there might be some mistake; so he replied that "it was hardly to be supposed Miss Rivers would attend without an invitation—she wasn't quite so verdant as that!"

FREDERICTON!

But she was of too cheerful a nature long to remember grief, and drying her tears, she soon forgot her trouble in the pride and satisfaction which she felt when she saw how well the white muslin became Lena, who John Jr. said, never looked so beautifully as she did when arrayed for the party. Mrs. Living when arrayed for the party. A peep behind the scenes would have that in all probability the old lady would not be permitted to attend. Her husband had expected a like opposition with regard to 'Lena, but he was disappointed. for his wife, forgetting her declaration that 'Lena should never darken her doors, and thinking it would not do to slight her, consented that, on her uncle's account, she should be invited. Accordingly, the notes were dispatched, produc ing the effect we have seen.

"How perfectly ridiculous to invite grandma!" said Carrie. "It's badenough to have 'Lena stuck in with us, for of course she'll go."

"Why of course ?" asked Mrs. Livingstone. "The invitations are at my distwo of them, no one will be blamed but half as handsome as 'Lena." Nero, who was careless and dropped and I don't feel like expending much more for a person so ungrateful as she is. You ought to have heard how impudent principles; perhaps I am mistaken-"

Then followed a one-sided description of that morning's occurrence, Mrs. Livingstone working herself up to such a pitch of excitement, that before her re cital was finished, she had determined at all events to keep back 'Lena's invitation as a method of punishing her for her "insolence," as she termed it.
