The Sea Serpent Mystery. Serious doubt has invaded the mind the St. Croix Courier, after reading an article, "the Jim-jams in Maine," regarding the reality of the amphibious monster, the fact, that, in a certain condition of mind, the most innocent objects may seem to assume a horrible grotesqueness. Shakespeare, in a famous passage in the 'Tempest' tells us that there are three sorts of men, "the poet, so the bride got mad and shipped him. the lover, and the madman" (we suppose he includes in the last category, the man in a state of cerebral excitement produced by excessive liquid exhilaration) "of imagination all compact" "which apprehends more than cool reason comprehends." If, as the poet says, it is easy in some moods and at some times to mistake a "bush" for a "bear," it is not improbable that a fantastically shaped log,

or river, has often been mistaken for a sea serpent.
