The Day Before the Wedding.

"And you have quite made up your mind to go after all, Bryan?"
"Well, I think you will agree with me, Constance, that in duty bound I must comply with my dear old uncle's request, and spend this last week with him."
"It must be, then, there is no gaining saying it. But you will stay longer than is absolutely necessary, dearest, will you?"
The pretty speaker looked up in her companion's face with such an expression of appeal—a look in which love, anxiety, and fear were all so beautifully blended, that the least he could do was to imprint upon her lips a kiss of reassurance and affection.
"I shall return, all being well, this night week. I should fidget you to death, I am afraid, if I stay here all the time. You know what a restless impatient fellow I am; and, now that my pretty little home is quite ready, I have nothing more to do but come to grace it with your presence."
Constance Willesley and Bryan Forrester were engaged to be married in a week's time. It was the 30th of March, and all preparations upon both sides were quite completed, so that nothing more remained for them to do but to wait with quiet patience they could till the long expected appointed day.
Mr. Willesley was a gentleman of property, living in a picturesque village in Cumberland. Constance, the pet and darling of the household, was his only child, and just twenty-two years of age.
Bryan Forrester was twenty-eight, an architect by profession, her equal by birth but at present not overburdened with the current coin of the realm.
However, he had a rich uncle (Mr. Gregory, a city merchant), from whom he had "expectations," and in obedience to whose summons he was now about to re-visit the Metropolis. He had left three years previously to design a large public building at Moretown, in Cumberland, and, meeting with great success, as the town was gradually rising into importance, he fixed on it as a place of abode, and soon after the completion of the building, Mr. Willesley and his daughter Constance.
Extensive preparations were being made in Russell Square for Bryan's reception. He was always a welcome visitor there. Left an orphan at the age of thirteen, Mr. Gregory had adopted him, and loved him as his son; and Bryan repaid his affectionate solicitude with a love both grateful and sincere.
All the skill of the ancient House-keeper, who had known him from a boy, was now put into requisition to make his room look snug and cheerful, and as much as possible as it used to do in former days; and all her culinary arts were displayed in preparing for him the dishes of which, as a school-boy, he had had a larger growth, too—she knew him to be fond.
The meeting between uncle and nephew was most genial. There was nothing of the "old fogey" about Mr. Gregory; though eight-and-fifty summers had passed over his head, he could enter into all his nephew's plans and feelings with the zest of a true friend and sagacious adviser.
"And so, Bryan, you are going to be married," he began, the following morning, at breakfast.
"Such is my desire, uncle."
"Ay, ay; no doubt. Well, I hope you will be very happy."
"I think it will be my own fault if I am not, with such a lovely girl as Constance. You must see her yourself, uncle, to form an opinion of her. Of course my judgment is biased."
"When you return from the Continent, you must pay me the first visit, mind."
"We shall be only too happy; and in the summer you must come and see us. I know you will be charmed with the lovely lake scenery."
"And now, Bryan, do you know why I sent for you?"
"For the pleasure of a last bachelor visit, I suppose."
"And also, dear boy, to formally make you my heir."
"You and I are too good to me!"
"You know I am what is called a rich man. Well, I have no patience with people who lie, hoarding up their money and their dear dear inheritance, and then to give you a good round sum to start you fairly and comfortably, and prefer to see you and your dear Constance settling myself, now, to leaving it to other people to do when I am dead."
After a little more talk on business matters, Bryan set out to look up some of his acquaintances, and to make some purchases which he had left till the present opportunity.
People coming up to London from the country always find the time pass very quickly. A week here seems but a few days; there is so much to be seen, to be heard, and to be done; and so if Bryan had tried ever so hard, he could not have hit upon a better means of employing his last week of bachelor life.
He had written almost every day to Constance, and she had replied accordingly. Now the time had come for him to bid his uncle good-bye, and take his departure for Moretown.
It was with a light heart and heavy purse—a most desirable combination—that he took his seat in the Hansom which was to convey him to the station. A long journey lay before him, but he could not resist his destination till ten p.m.
But what of that? With very happy thoughts and plenty of money, a day's selling may be made tolerably comfortable in this age of comfort and luxury.
So soliloquized our young friend at the commencement of his journey. Little did he think that he would find him here at his destination.
His luggage consisted only of a black leather portmanteau and an umbrella—he had traveled with a lot of impedimenta—both of which, for very good reasons, he took into the carriage with him; and he wore a light overcoat and round felt hat.
For some distance his only fellow-travelers were an old gentleman—who was soon, by the motion of the train, lulled into a state of somnolence—and a young man, who, after making himself quite comfortable, proceeded to discuss the contents of the morning's paper with Bryan.
However, after passing several small stations in the most approved railroad fashion, their numbers were augmented by the entrance of a young man, apparently about Bryan's own age and height, dressed with great care, and wearing a coat and hat similar to his. He was accompanied by a showy-looking young lady with an umbrella, while he, like Bryan, brought his portmanteau in and his bustling station at which they got in, and so, amidst the hurry and confusion of passengers hastening hither and thither, they were not particularly noticed. The young man, however, in the middle of the compartment opposite one another, and the train was soon in motion again.
Evidently, the new-comers were not of a social turn of mind, for each produced a book, and appeared immediately to become absorbed in its contents.
As the day wore on, Bryan's not very large stock of patience began sensibly to diminish. He became fidgety, restless, could not read, could not sit still; and it was with much satisfaction he discovered by the aid of his Bradshaw, that the next stoppage would be at a junction, where all would have to change.
"Here we are at last!" he exclaimed, as the train came to a standstill, and his impetuosity, he was the first to issue from the carriage.
With his umbrella in one hand and portmanteau in the other, he is striding along the platform in the direction of the refreshment rooms, when two tall men, with high buttoned up coats, and helmets on their heads, and very good boots on either side of him, and while one relieves him of his umbrella and portmanteau—which is done so suddenly and adroitly, that he has no time to react, the other claps a pair of handcuffs on him.
To picture his indignation and amazement is simply impossible.
"Gentlemen! heavens! What do you mean? Take those things off! Unhose me instantly, or I'll—I'll—"
"None of that, sir, if you please. You just come quietly along with us, and don't get making a row for everybody in the station to hear."
"Everybody in the station shall hear if you don't unhose me, one of you. Block heads! you are making a gross mistake, I can tell you. For whom do you take me?"

Come, now, that's a good 'un! As if you didn't know we'd been a-looking out for you all this week!"
"What do you mean by such insolence? Take me to the non-master and let me speak to him, if you won't believe me?"
"All right! this way out."
"I tell you, you have got the wrong man, and you shall pay dearly for it if you do not let me go. I appeal to this gentleman; and Bryan began his tale to a bystander, but he, on a wink from the policeman, went his way without listening.
"There," said that functionary, "you'll get no good by this palaver, so you'd better stop it!"
A cold perspiration broke out on Bryan's brow as he began to perceive the uselessness of talking to beings so obtuse as these myrmidons of the law. If they had taken the trouble to examine his countenance carefully, they might have known that his look of agony, was not caused by detection in crime, but by the horror experienced by innocence, upon finding itself mistaken for guilt.
"Heaven have mercy upon me and help me in this strait!" he fervently exclaimed, "I will now call on you, these fools to release me!"
"Look here, my good fellows," said he, changing his tone: "you, no doubt, think you are performing your duty, and taking some villain into custody; but as true as there is a heaven above us, you are wrong this time! Let me, at least, know for whom you take, and I'll refer you to my uncle, Mr. Gregory."
"We are so well up to all the pretty little dodges of you gentlemen, that we shall leave Mr. Mayor to refer to him in the morning if he likes you."
"In the morning? Why, you rascals, to-morrow is my wedding. Oh! if you have any humanity in you, believe me, I will not let you do this to me!"
Arrived at the station-house, all of a sudden there flashed before his mind the image of the young man who had got in his carriage at the same time as he.
"Ah!" he exclaimed, and hope dawned upon him. "I see it all now. The very same height, complexion, overcoat portmanteau, and all!"
Then tearing a leaf out of his pocket-book, he wrote something on it in pencil, and gave it with his card to one of the policemen, saying, in as firm a tone as he could assume:
"Will you oblige me by taking this note to the Mayor?"
"I'll take it, sir, if it were any use, but he don't live here in the town; his house is at least three miles away."
A hearty imprecation broke from Bryan's lips, and producing a sovereign, he said:
"How many of these will you take to let me go at once?"
"Won't do, sir. Daren't do it."
"Don't do it, then, leaving him to his own sad and rather confused reflections.
How long he sat there thinking and raging he could not tell. It seemed to him as if a thousand years had passed. At last footsteps sounded outside, the door opened, and the same two policemen returned with rather a cringing gait and sheepish looks.
"We most humbly beg your pardon, sir, but we find we have been mistaken. News has just been telegraphed to us that the gentleman in question is to be married to-morrow. He has been captured at Doncaster."
After a natural burst of indignation, in which he promised them they should shortly hear of something to their disadvantage, away Bryan rushed, and was soon being driven to the station he had quitted a few hours previously in such ignominious fashion.
He hoped to catch the last train to Moretown; but on his arrival on the platform, to his great disappointment, he found it had just started.
To dispatch a telegram to Constance, telling her that he had been unexpectedly detained on his journey, that she was not to be alarmed, and that the ceremony would be postponed, was his next business, and then there was nothing for it but to wait.

Mr. Joseph Coppin, who resides near Newport, Ky., has prepared his own coffin, which was made with his own hands, in which he is to be buried. The coffin is of white pine. The sides and the bottom are painted red, white and blue, and the lid is covered with American flags. Near the head, covered with a small American flag, is a picture of Mr. Coppin, taken when he was in the prime of life.
