But little Kate did not come back. She had been watching her opportunity to get off, and had already been gone sometime.

She slept in an open field; crawled in some hay; she would have walked all night if she had dared, but she was afraid night if she had dared, but she was afraid to and fro of the darkness.

"Mr. Warden, there's a queer case over at my house," said a bluff looking fellow, meeting the warden of Sing-Sing prison. "We found her last night in some out-of-the way place, and nothing would do but my wife must take her in. We can't find out her name, except that it is Kate, and I expect that she wants to see somebody in prison. But we can't get anything out of her—where she's came from or anything about it."

"Bring her over here," said the war-den—"my wife is wanting a little girl for help; maybe she's just the one."
