"Certainly, aunt. What is it?" asked the girl smiling.

The smile, however, vanished as she saw the gravity of her companion's features.

"I have long suspected, my child, but lately I have felt quite convinced, that you love Captain Conway."

Margaret's gaze drooped; her cheek

was not averse to the arrangement, for though not in love, George Stangrove was good-looking, good-humored, and pleasant. Neither, at first, had the gentlemen seemed backward, for the lady had a handsome fortune, and matters had gone on pretty well until over a year ago, when Captain George had showed such a decided loosening in his attentions, that it had roused his mother to declare that if he did not wed Sophia Pomeroy, she would, as she could, disinherit him.

He made no response; he did not say

Last night I promised to be his wife: thus I have a right to know; while so certain am I that my happiness is your happiness, that I feel whatever you have heard, whether right or wrong, you believe out of no dislike to Arthur, or to give me pain."
Mrs. Stangrove tenderly kissed Margaret's white forehead. "You read me correctly, darling," she said. "Yes, you say truly: you have a right to know all. Listen. My suspicions were first aroused that evening when Capt. Conway brought those photographs to show you the likenesses of his family. While you and he were engaged with others, I took up the packet, and was instantly struck by the extreme loveliness of one: a vignette representing a young wounded, and extra nurses were sumgirl of hardly twenty. I exclaimed: "What exquisite features! Is it a relation, Captain Conway ?" "He turned red to the hair. His manner was confused, vexed. Almost uncivily taking the vignette from me, he thrust it into his pocket, saying: "It is no relation, Mrs. Stangrove-it and the dead.

"That once a week regularly Captain Conway visits a house in Brunton Street, where the original of that vignette lives in apartments. He remains there two or three hours together, and appears on the most friendly footing."

Margaret dropped into a chair, and buried her face in her hands. "Do not be alarmed," the girl said, in dull, stunned accents. "I shall not faint. The paroxysm will soon have ceased—as perfectly ceased as any engagement between me and Capt. Conway, if he does "Goo!" not explain all this, not only to my, but also to your satisfaction."

"My love, will you really promise me "I will, and do." Such a happy ending, however, was not to be. When the officer came that evening, by Margaret's desire, Mrs. Stangrove saw him alone, and, referring to his inten-

The above is a good likeness of Mrs. Lydia E. Pinkham, of Lynn, Mass., who above all other human beings may be truthfully called the "Dear Friend of Woman," as some of her correspondents love to call her. She is zealously devoted to her work, which is the outcome of a life-study, and is obliged to keep six lady assistants, to help her answer the large correspondence which daily pours in upon her, each bearing its special burden of suffering, or joy at release from it. Her Vegetable Compound is a medicine for good and not evil purposes. I have personally investigated it and am satisfied of the truth of this. On account of its proven merits, it is recommended and prescribed by the best physicians in the country. One says. "It works like a charm and saves much pain.
