To complicate matters there is a rising among the wild Bedouin Arabs, and a fear that they will prove another element of danger in a very entangled state of affairs. Already a Turkish fleet is preparing to put to sea, and orders have been given by the British Admiralty to the channel fleet to hold itself in readiness to sail for Alexandria. France and England will act in accord and along with Turkey. A demonstration on the part of these three powers may bring the army and Maroudi Bey, to their senses, but there is no saying what rash step their presumption may cause them to take.
