As events are working, England, to all appearance, has been drawn into a very difficult position, which will compel her to put forth all her power to right herself with honor. As the Conference in Constantinople sits in secret, nothing is authoritavely known of its deliberations. Something, however, always escapes of the most secret of conclaves, and, according to a late rumor, the Conference was not making progress. England was the only power who was determined to oppose Arabi Bey and the Egyptian National party. It looks very like as if Germany, Austria, Italy and Turkey were all playing against her-with France as a backer but determined not to take a hand in the game now that it While the public mind is agitated over has become very deep. It has become evident that the difficulty in Egypt has been a long time in train, that Arabi Bey has had all along the secret countenance of the Porte, A strong gale. Never from all accounts find a new camp. Shifted by dark. was the prestige, the influence of England in the East at so low an ebb as it is at present, and she will require to put forth a mighty effort to retrieve her former position and influence. From all accounts the war authorities have made preparations to send a large military force to Egypt; still there is a lurking impression amongst some that the Gladstone government after all demonstrations will up. back down.

But, surely it is scarcely possible that they will do that; either the indignation of the country would compel them to act resolutely, foot gear. or sweep them from power. England has every motive to act resolutely and put forth all her strength, though it may involve her in complications with other Powers, and compel her to make a costly sacrifice of blood and money. Was her hold on Egypt shaken, and her control of the Suez Canal lost, her commerce with the East would receive a deadly blow. She would be, at the will of other Powers, cut off from the shortest and most direct route to India, which would be perilous to her Empire there, and beyond all, the humiliation would react disastrously ou her reputation and influence all over the world. Nations are like men, when a country like an individual has carried itself very high, and it encounters loss and disgrace it is made to feel its altered position bitterly at every turn. The scale of England's military preparations which go no further, it is said, than to put in motion, of all arms, 40,000 men, and half that force at first, may make the military authorities of Germany, who can turn out army corps, numbering one or two hundred thousand men, at a day's notice, smile.
