Maybe! Maybe! 'twas better so. When the winds of March were loud And the skies were dark with cloud. He had won her love forever. And she trusted all he vowed, And she wept against his heart "Oh, my darling we must part, For a barrier lies between us. Forever more sweetheart?"

Maybe! Maybe! we cannot know;

Maybe! Maybe! We cannot know, Maybe! Maybe! 'twas better so. And the years have passed away And they are both old and grey, But the same sweet dream is in their hearts Forever and for aye,

Oh, sweet and sad the pain Of the love that will not wane So sweet because so true

So sweet and sad in vain Maybe! Maybe! We cannot know Maybe! Maybe! it shall be better so.

CHAPTER XXXV. EXCITEMENT AT MAPLE GROVE.

"'Lena been gone four weeks and father never stirred a peg after her! That is smart, I must say. Why didn't you let me know it before!" exclaimed John Jr., as he one morning unexpectedly made his appearance at Maple Grove.

During his absence Carrle had been his only correspondent, and for some reason which graphs are correspondent, and for some reason which will be a some server and the same and for some reason which will be a some server and the same and for some reason which which will be a some server and the same and some server and the same and some server and s after his cousin.

"Shut up your head," roared John Jr. 'Lena arrives?"

"Lena is no more guilty than you. By George, I 'most cried when I heard how nobly she worked to save Anna from old Baldhead. And this is her reward! Gracious Peter! I sometimes wish there Gracious Peter! I sometimes wish there by the world!"

"Lena arrives!"

Knowing that, under the circumstances, it would look better, Mrs. Liviugstone said "yes," while Carrie, thinking Durward would be there, made a similar reply, saying "she was exceedingly anxious to see her cousin." wasn't a woman in the world!"

"If they'd all marry you, there wouldn't be long!" retorted Carrie.

"You've said it now, haven't you?" answered John Jr., while his father suggested that they stop quarrelling, adding, as an apology for his own neglect, that Durward had gone after 'Lena, who was probably at Mr. Everitt's, and that he himself had advertised in all the principal papers.

"Just like Bellmont! He's a fine fellow and deserves 'Lena, if anybody does," exclaimed John Jr., while Carrie chimed in, "Pshaw! I've no idea he's gone for her."

"Very well. I will let you know when I expect her," said Mrs. Graham, curtsying herself from the room.

"Spell Toady, Cad," whispered John Jr., and with more than her usual quickness, Carrie replied, by doing as he desired.

"That'll do," said he, as he walked off to the back yard, where he found the younger portion of the blacks engaged in a rather novel employment for them.

The news of 'Lena's good fortune had reached the kitchen, causing much excitement, for she was a favorite there.

"Pshaw! I've no idea he's gone for her. Why, they've hardly spoken for several months, and besides that, Mrs. Graham will never suffer him to marry one of so the brick pavement."

me see that, sir?" advancing toward his father, who, placing the letter in his hand. walked to the window to hide the varied emotions of his face. Rapidly John Jr. perused it, comprehending the whole; then, when it was finished, he seized his hat, and throwing it up in the air, shouted, "Hurrah! Hurrah for Miss 'Lena Rivers Graham, daughter of the Honorable Harry Rivers Graham I was never so glad in my life, Hurrah!" and again the hat went up, upsetting in its descent a costly vase, the fragments of which followed in the direction of the hat, as the young man capered about the room, perfectly insane with joy. "Is the boy crazy?" asked Mrs. Livingstone, catching him by the coat as he passed her, while Carrie attempted to snatch the letter from his hand. "Crazy ?-yes," said he. "Who do you think 'Lena's father is? No less a person than Mr. Graham himself! Now taunt her again, Cad, with her low origin, if you like. She isn't coming here to live any more. She's going to Woodlawn. She'll marry Durward, while you'll be a cross, dried-up old maid, eh, Cad?" and he chucked her under the chin, while she began to cry, bidding him let her alone. "What do you mean?" interposed Mrs. Livingstone trembling lest it might be I will read the letter and you can judge for youself," replied John Both Carrie and her mother were too much astonished to utter a syllable, while, in their hearts, each hoped it would prove untrue. Bending forward, grandma had listened eagerly, her dim eye lighting up as she occasionally caught the meaning of what she heard; but she could not understand it at once, and turning to her son, she said, "What is it, John? what does it mean?" As well as they could, Mr. Livingstone and John Jr. explained it to her, and when at length she comprehended it, in her own peculiar way she exclaimed, "Thauk God that 'Leny is a lady, at last--as good as the biggest on 'em. Oh, I wish Helleny had lived to know who her husband was. Poor Critter! Mebby he'll give me money to go back and see the old place, once more, afore I'die.'

"If he don't I will," said Mr. Livingstone, upon which his wife, who had not spoken before, wondered "where he'd get it." By this time Carrie had comf, orted herself with the assurance, that as Lena was Durward's sister, he would not, of course, marry her, and determining to make the best of it, she replied to her brother, who rallied her on her crest-fallen looks, that he was greatly mistaken, for "she was as pleased as any one at 'Lena's good fortune, but it did not follow that she must make a fool of herself, as some others

The closing part of this remark was lost on John Jr., who had left the room. In the first excitement, he had thought "how glad Nellie will be," and acting, as he generally did, upon impulse, he now ordered his horse, and dashing off at full speed, at usual, surprised Nellie, first with his sudden appearance, second, with his announcement of 'Lena's parentage, and third, by an offer of himself! "It's your destiny," said he, "and it's of no use to resist. What did poor little

Meb die for, if it wasn't to make room for you. So you may as well say yes first as last. I'm odd, I know, but you can fix me over. I'll do exactly what you wish me to. Say yes, Nellie, won't you ?" And Nellie did say yes, wondering, the while, if ever before woman had such wooing. We thing not, for never was there another John Jr. "I have had happiness enough for one day," said he, kissing her blushing cheek and hurrying away. As if every hitherto neglected duty were now suddenly remembered, he went straight from Mr. Douglass' to the mar-ble factory, where he ordered a costly stone for the little grave on the sunny slope, as yet unmarked save by the tall grass and rank weeds which grew above

"What inscription will you have? asked the engraver. John Jr. thought for a moment, and then replied, "Simply 'Mabel.' Nothing more nor less; that tells the whole story, and involuntarily murmuring to himself, "Poor little Meb, I wish she knew how happy I am," he started for home, where he was somewhat surprised to find Mrs. Graham.

She had also received a letter from her husband, and deeming secrecy no longer advisable, had come over to Maple Grove, where, to her great satisfaction, she found that the news had preceded her. Feeling sure that Mrs. Graham must feel greatly annoyed, both Carrie and her mother began, at first, to act the part of consolers, telling her it might not be true after all, for perhaps it was a ruse of Mr. Graham's io cover some deep-laid scheme. But for once in her life Mrs. Graham did well, and to their astonishment, replied, "Oh. I hope not, for you do not know how I long for the society of a daughter, and as Mr. Graham's child I shall gladly welcome 'Lena home, trying, if possible, to overlook the vulgarity of her family

Though wincing terribly, neither Mrs. Livingstone nor her daughter were to be outgeneraled If Mrs. Graham could so soon change her tactics, so could they, and for the next half hour they landed

Accordingly, as it was now dark, the children were set at work gathering blocks, chips, sticks, dried twigs, and leaves, and by the time John Jr. appeared they had collected quite a pile. Not knowing how he would like it, they all took to their heels, except Thomas Jefferson, who having some of his mother's spirit, stood his ground, replying, when asked what they were about, that they were 'gwine to celebrate Miss 'Lena.''
